

FOOL'S STAGE

THE FLIP SIDE OF KNOWLEDGE

A Story by Alias Lupus

FOOL'S STAGE | The Flip Side of Knowledge

Copyright © 2026 Portal Master Of Games

All rights reserved.

Recommended Reading Age: 16+

First Edition Reading Edition

Genre: Philosophical Fantasy • Adventure Fantasy • Mystery Fantasy

For everyone who has ever followed a road without knowing where it would lead.

And for those who discovered that the journey mattered more than the destination.

Contents

Contents

Contents	3
To the Reader	6
Characters	7
Places.....	9
Part I: The Wagon.....	10
Prologue	11
Chapter 1: Rain Over Maanhaven	14
Chapter 2: The Wagon That Remembered	19
Chapter 3: The Keeper's Message	25
Chapter 4: The First Companions	29
Chapter 5: East of Home	32
Chapter 6: The First Wrong Turn.....	35
Chapter 7: The Reflection's Door	38
Part II: The Road Beyond Reflection.....	41
Chapter 8: The Morning After Mirrors.....	42
Chapter 9: Weather That Listens.....	47
Chapter 10: The Archive of Unanswered Questions.....	51
Chapter 11: Questions by Firelight.....	55
Chapter 12: Toward the Anchor	59
Part III: The Structures.....	63
Chapter 13: Roads Between Questions.....	64
Chapter 14: The Anchor of Certainty	68

Chapter 15: Certainty.....	74
Chapter 16: The Lesson of Doubt.....	79
Chapter 17: A Name in the Journal.....	84
Part IV: The Name That Remained.....	90
Chapter 18: The Road East.....	91
Chapter 19: Dreams of Another Life	94
Chapter 20: Hollow Creek	97
Chapter 21: The Silent Observatory.....	100
Chapter 22: The Name That Remained.....	103
Part V: The Echoes Of Varux	106
Chapter 23: The Journal Road	107
Chapter 24: Footsteps in Stone	108
Chapter 25: The Weight of Similarity.....	109
Chapter 26: The Hall of Remembered Voices.....	110
Chapter 27: The Echoes of Varux	111
Part VI: The City Of Glass.....	113
Chapter 28: Beyond the Hall	114
Chapter 29: The Road of Mirrors	117
Chapter 30: The City of Glass	120
Chapter 31: Reflections of Tomorrow.....	123
Chapter 32: A Message Across Time.....	126
Part VII: The Divided Path	129
Chapter 33: The Road That Split.....	130
Chapter 34: Cracks in the Group.....	131
Chapter 35: The Traveler at the Crossroads.....	132

Chapter 36: The Valley of Echoes.....	133
Chapter 37: A Choice Made in Silence	135
Part VIII: The Fall Of Alias.....	136
Chapter 38: Leaving the Valley	137
Chapter 39: The Broken Journal.....	140
Chapter 40: Blood on the Stone	142
Chapter 41: The Last Entry.....	144
Chapter 42: Ashes of a Name	146
Part IX: The Messenger	149
Chapter 43: Beyond the Mountains.....	150
Chapter 44: The Inn at Gray Hollow	151
Chapter 45: The Man Called Bizo	152
Chapter 46: Stories of Varux	154
Chapter 47: The Beginning of Doubt	155
Part X: The Flip Side Of Knowledge.....	156
Chapter 48: The Road East.....	157
Chapter 49: What the Mage Saw.....	159
Chapter 50: The Final Structure	161
Chapter 51: Varux.....	163
Chapter 52: Alias.....	165
Chapter 53: The Name Not Written	170

To the Reader

If you are reading this, then one of two things has happened.

Either I willingly handed you this journal, or you found it somewhere I forgot it. Both are equally possible. Before you continue, there is something you should know: I am not a hero. If you were hoping for a tale of a chosen one, a king in exile, or a warrior destined to save the world, I am afraid you may be disappointed. I was a traveler. Curious, stubborn, hungry more often than wise, and usually one question away from trouble.

The pages that follow are a record of several years of my life.

Some memories remain clear enough that I could still draw them with my eyes closed: rain on Maanhaven's harbor, the smell of Gerhardt's stew, Rowan laughing at exactly the wrong moment, Maris turning a page as though the world depended on it, Corvin proving everyone else wrong, and Eldric drinking tea while pretending he did not know more than he said. Other memories are not so kind. Some faces blur when I reach for them. Some voices vanish halfway through a thought. I began writing because I was afraid of forgetting.

Not just roads. Not just places. People. Conversations. The warmth of a fire after a week of rain. The shape of a town when you are leaving it. The sound of friends arguing over something that did not matter until years later, when you would give anything to hear it again. Those are the things time steals first, and those are the things I tried to save. If you find answers in these pages, good. If you find more questions, even better. And if you ever find a strange coin during a storm, you should probably leave it alone. I certainly should have.

— Alias Lupus, Maanhaven, 747 EC

Characters

Alias Lupus

A young traveler from Maanhaven with a habit of collecting stories, questions, and trouble in roughly equal measure. Curious to a fault and rarely content with simple answers, he finds himself drawn toward mysteries older than the roads themselves.

Maris Veylen

A dedicated scholar whose love of knowledge is matched only by her determination to preserve it. Careful, observant, and endlessly curious, Maris rarely lets a useful detail escape her notice.

Rowan Briarlock

A traveler with a talent for finding excitement in places where common sense suggests there should be none. Quick with a joke and quicker to defend his friends, Rowan approaches most dangers with alarming confidence.

Corvin Ashford

A surveyor who trusts maps, measurements, and evidence above all else. Practical and analytical, Corvin often finds himself balancing the group's more adventurous impulses.

Eldric Thornvale

A quiet mage whose knowledge seems to extend further than he is willing to explain. Patient and thoughtful, he often offers guidance in the form of questions rather than answers.

Gerhardt Voss

The owner of The Wandering Lantern in Maanhaven. Equal parts innkeeper, advisor, and reluctant voice of reason, Gerhardt has spent many years watching travelers come and go.

Varux Hyborea

A legendary traveler whose journals and records appear throughout the world. Though long absent, his influence continues to shape the journey in ways few fully understand.

Bizo

A wandering traveler encountered during the eastern stages of the journey. Friendly, knowledgeable, and difficult to place, he seems to know more than he initially reveals.

Places

Maanhaven

A bustling harbor town on the western coast where the journey begins.

The Wandering Lantern

A well-known tavern in Maanhaven and a gathering place for travelers, sailors, merchants, and storytellers.

The Wagon

A mysterious traveling archive filled with journals, maps, records, and questions gathered across generations.

The Structures

Ancient locations scattered throughout the world. Each appears to preserve a different lesson, mystery, or perspective.

The Reflection of Many Faces

A Structure concerned with identity, choice, and the many versions of oneself that exist across a lifetime.

The Archive of Unanswered Questions

A hidden repository devoted not to answers, but to preserving the questions people refuse to abandon.

Gray Hollow

A quiet settlement along the eastern roads where travelers often stop before continuing their journeys.

The Eastern Sea

A distant coastline tied to many of the mysteries recorded throughout the archive.

Part I: The Wagon

Prologue

Rain hammered the western road until the old wagon ruts disappeared beneath moving water. The storm had come from the sea without warning, rolling over the cliffs and fields with the confidence of something that had crossed half the world to arrive there. By dusk, most travelers had already abandoned the road and found shelter wherever they could.

Farmers closed their shutters. Merchants cursed their schedules. Even the gulls had vanished from the sky.

The man walking toward Maanhaven should have stopped hours ago. He knew that. He had known it when the first thunder rolled across the hills, and he knew it more deeply now as mud pulled at his boots and rain worked its way beneath his collar.

But a promise was a promise, and if there was one thing the road taught a person, it was that promises only mattered when keeping them became inconvenient. So he kept walking, one hand gripping his cloak, the other shielding the small parcel beneath it.

He had traveled this route often enough to know its shape by memory. The road curved past the broken milestone, dipped through the shallow valley where water always gathered, then climbed toward the ridge from which the harbor lights of Maanhaven could be seen on clear nights. Tonight there were no clear lights. There was only rain, and wind, and the occasional flash of lightning showing him pieces of the world before darkness stole them back.

Then lightning split the sky again, and he saw the wagon. At first he thought it must belong to another traveler trapped by the weather. A foolish merchant, perhaps, or a farmer who had underestimated the storm and now regretted the decision.

Then the next flash came, and the shape of the wagon sharpened through the rain. No horses stood before it. No driver sat hunched on the bench. No lantern swung from its frame. Yet its wheels turned slowly through the mud as though pulled by hands the world had forgotten how to see. The man stepped off the road. He did it slowly, carefully, the way one moves around a sleeping animal that might wake hungry. The wagon did not slow. It rolled past him with patient certainty, water running down its dark wooden sides.

There were markings carved into the panels, symbols worn by time but not erased. He knew enough old roads and older ruins to understand that they were not merchant marks, not family crests, not warnings placed by any living guild. They belonged to the kind of history most people left buried because digging it up made ordinary life less comfortable.

For one moment, as the wagon passed, he felt certain something inside it was aware of him. Not watching, exactly. Waiting. The thought froze him in place long after the wheels moved on and the rain swallowed the shape again. When he finally forced himself back onto the road, only the tracks remained, deep and straight, leading toward Maanhaven. He considered following them immediately. Curiosity urged him forward.

Common sense, rare but not absent, pulled him back. Whatever the wagon was, it was not his promise. His path led elsewhere.

Far ahead, beyond the rain and the harbor walls, a young wolffolk sat beside a tavern window with a notebook open before him. He had three copper coins, a bowl of stew he could not afford, and a habit of writing down everything he feared time might steal. His name was Alias Lupus, and before the week ended, the wagon would teach him that some questions do not wait to be asked.

Chapter 1: Rain Over Maanhaven

Rain changed Maanhaven. On clear days, the harbor town seemed built from noise itself: gulls shrieking over fish stalls, merchants calling prices across the docks, sailors singing badly before noon, carts rattling over cobblestones, children racing between market awnings, dogs barking as though every arriving ship had offended them personally.

The whole town leaned toward the sea, restless and salt-stained, always waiting for the next tide to bring trade, trouble, or both.

Storms made it smaller. Streets emptied. Shutters closed. Lanterns appeared earlier in windows, turning the wet cobbles gold. Ships rocked against their moorings while sailors moved quickly across the docks, securing ropes and muttering prayers to every power that had ever claimed responsibility for weather. The harbor became a dark mirror, broken by rain.

At the edge of the square stood The Wandering Lantern, a tavern old enough that nobody agreed who had named it. Its sign hung from iron brackets above the door: a painted lantern swinging from a crooked staff, its yellow flame chipped by years of weather. In the wind, the sign creaked like an elderly man complaining about being asked to stand.

Gerhardt Voss insisted it was part of the charm. Most regulars suspected he simply did not want to pay for repairs.

Inside, the tavern held back the storm with firelight, thick beams, and stubborn cheer. Wet cloaks steamed near the hearth. Bowls of stew traveled from the kitchen to crowded tables. Sailors argued over card games that none of them seemed to understand the rules for. A merchant with a purple scarf was telling anyone unfortunate enough to sit nearby that prices in the north had become unreasonable. Nobody asked which prices. Nobody needed to. Merchants always found something unreasonable.

Alias Lupus sat near the window, where the glass rattled whenever thunder rolled over the harbor. He liked that seat because it allowed him to watch the room and the street at the same time. Watching was useful. Watching told him which travelers carried money and which only wanted people to think they did. It told him which sailors were too drunk to notice missing coin and which were pretending to be drunk so others would underestimate them. It told him when Gerhardt noticed him noticing, which was often.

Another roll of thunder echoed across the harbor. One of Alias's grey wolf ears twitched beneath the hood of his coat before he could stop it, while the tail curled around the leg of his chair in quiet annoyance. Thunder never bothered him.

The noise was simply impossible to ignore.

He counted the coins in his pocket beneath the table. Three copper. He waited a moment, then counted them again, in case desperation had become a valid mathematical method.

Three copper remained three copper. It was enough for bread if he chose a cheap stall in the morning. It was not enough for stew, lodging, ink, and the replacement pencil he needed after losing the last one somewhere near the docks.

Hunger suggested stew. Practicality suggested bread.

His notebook suggested ink. The notebook usually won arguments, which explained much about his life.

'If you stare any harder, they'll melt,' Gerhardt said from behind the counter. Alias looked up. The foxfolk tavern keeper polished a mug with a cloth that had survived so many years it deserved its own name. Gerhardt's reddish ears twitched toward the room even while his eyes remained on Alias, catching fragments of every conversation without appearing to listen to any.

He had the steady build of someone who carried barrels when younger and opinions when older. His fur showed silver around the muzzle now, though no one with sense mentioned it.

'I was hoping one of them would multiply,' Alias said. 'Coins don't reproduce.' 'That sounds like poor design.' Gerhardt snorted. 'If money worked that way, I'd own half of Vaelor.'

'Only half?' 'The other half belongs to tax collectors.' A merchant nearby laughed into his drink. Alias smiled and returned the coins to his pocket. Humor cost nothing, which made it one of his more reliable resources.

He opened his notebook. It had once been a fine thing, or at least fine enough for a traveling clerk. Now the cover was faded, softened by rain, and repaired along one edge with careful stitching. The pages inside were worse. Some had been torn and mended. Others were crowded with writing so small it looked like ants had organized a meeting.

Sketches filled margins where words had failed him: roofs, faces, road signs, broken bridges, a gull stealing fish from a man who deserved it. Dates appeared wherever he remembered to write them. Weather appeared more often, because weather was harder to ignore.

Most people assumed Alias wrote because he enjoyed writing. That was true, but incomplete. The real reason lived in the unfinished sketch tucked near the back of the notebook: two figures standing beside a doorway he could not clearly remember. Their bodies were outlined well enough. Their hands, their posture, even the folds of their clothes were there. Their faces were blank. Not because he had never tried to draw them. Because every time he tried, the details slipped away before the pencil reached the page.

He remembered fragments. A woman's voice humming while rain struck a roof. A man's hand guiding his grip around a small knife and telling him tools were only as honest as the hand using them. Warmth. Smoke. Running. Then gaps. So many gaps. Sometimes he wondered whether everyone carried broken places inside themselves and simply refused to mention them. Other times he suspected the problem belonged only to him.

So he wrote. Names before they faded. Roads before they turned in memory. Conversations before time polished them into lies. He wrote because ink did not forget as quickly as he did. Alias dipped his pen and added a line beneath the day's entry. Rain. Three copper. Gerhardt still refuses to admit I am his favorite customer.

'Cross that out,' Gerhardt said. Alias looked up. 'You were not looking.' 'I do not need to look to know when you're writing nonsense.' 'Accurate nonsense.' Gerhardt placed a bowl of stew on the counter for a waiting sailor. 'Dangerous kind.'

Alias crossed out the line, though lightly enough that it remained readable if one cared to look. Future historians, he felt, deserved the truth.

Outside, lightning flashed, turning the harbor square white for a heartbeat. Alias saw the docks, the rain, the empty market stalls, the statue of some old harbor founder whose name everyone misremembered, and the road leading west toward the hills. Then darkness returned. The tavern noise filled the gap, but not quite as fully as before. He noticed one sailor staring toward the window. Then another. Gerhardt's polishing cloth slowed.

'What?' Alias asked. Gerhardt did not answer immediately. His ears angled toward the storm. His eyes narrowed at the rain-streaked glass. 'Maybe nothing,' the tavern keeper said.

Alias disliked maybe nothing. In his experience, maybe nothing usually became definitely something at the worst possible time.

Another flash of lightning revealed a shape moving at the far edge of the square. Large. Wooden. There and gone before he could properly focus. The room continued talking, but a seam of silence had opened inside the noise. Alias felt it spread from table to table as more people looked toward the window. The storm pressed against the tavern walls. Rain ran down the glass.

Somewhere beyond the harbor road, something moved toward Maanhaven with the patient certainty of a thing that had no reason to hurry.

Chapter 2: The Wagon That Remembered

The wagon arrived just before midnight. By then half the tavern had convinced itself that the shape in the storm was a cart, a trick of lightning, or a sailor's imagination made contagious by drink. The other half had grown quiet enough to make pretending difficult. When the next flash came, the entire square lit up and the wagon rolled into view.

No horses pulled it. No driver sat on the bench. No lantern hung from its frame. Its wheels turned through puddles with slow, steady purpose, throwing water to either side. The old wood shone black in the rain. Iron bands held the wheels together, rusted but whole. Carvings ran along the side panels in lines too deliberate to be damage and too strange to be decoration.

The tavern held its breath. Even Rowan Briarlock, though none of them knew him yet, would later agree that a driverless wagon appearing from a storm deserved at least three seconds of silence before anyone said something foolish. A fisherman near the door made the first attempt. 'Well,' he said, then stopped because no useful second word arrived.

The wagon reached the center of the square and stopped. No dramatic crash. No burst of magic. It simply ceased moving, as if it had arrived precisely where it meant to be. Rain continued to strike its roof. Water streamed from its sides. Nothing else happened. Gerhardt looked at Alias. Alias looked at Gerhardt. 'No,' Gerhardt said.

'I did not say anything.' 'You were about to.' 'I might have been about to ask a responsible question.' 'You were about to go outside.' Alias considered denying it, but Gerhardt had known him too long for the lie to be worth the effort.

'Someone should inspect it.' 'Someone with a badge, a weapon, or less curiosity than you.' 'Those people are not moving.'

That was true. The town guard, represented in the tavern that night by one off-duty man trying very hard not to be recognized, had become deeply interested in the bottom of his mug. The sailors were suddenly experts in remaining indoors. Merchants, who loved owning things, showed no desire to claim this one.

Gerhardt sighed, ducked beneath the counter, and produced a lantern. He placed it on the table in front of Alias with the air of a man participating in a mistake because stopping it would take too much energy. 'Bring it back.' 'Me or the lantern?'
'The lantern is useful.' Alias took it anyway.

The moment he opened the tavern door, rain rushed in like it had been waiting for an invitation. Several patrons complained. None offered to take his place. Alias stepped into the square and the door closed behind him, cutting off most of the warmth and noise. The lantern made a small circle of gold around his boots. Beyond it, the world was water, stone, and shadow.

The wagon waited in the center of the square. Up close it looked older than he had expected. Not abandoned, exactly.
Abandonment had a smell, a sagging quality, a looseness in joints and hinges. This wagon looked weathered but maintained, as though age had touched it without being permitted to ruin it. The carvings along the side panels seemed deeper in the lantern light.

Lines curved into symbols Alias did not recognize, each connected to the next in a pattern that suggested language.

Or warning. Or both.

He circled slowly, aware of faces watching through the tavern windows. The front bench was empty. The traces where harnesses should have connected to horses showed nothing except rainwater. No footprints surrounded the wagon besides his own. The rear door stood slightly open. 'Of course it does,' Alias muttered.

He should have waited for morning. He should have called the guard. He should have remembered every story ever told about curious people opening mysterious doors. Instead he lifted the lantern and pulled. The door opened with a soft groan. The smell that drifted out was not rot, mold, or wet straw. It was paper. Old paper, leather, ink, dust, and something faintly herbal, like dried leaves pressed between pages. Alias held the lantern higher.

The wagon was full of books. Not a few. Not a merchant's crate of them. Full. Shelves lined both walls from floor to ceiling. Crates were packed beneath benches. Rolled maps occupied narrow compartments. Wooden drawers filled the rear section, each marked with small symbols. Journals rested in rows, some cracked with age, others new enough that the leather still held color. Loose papers were tied in bundles with faded ribbon. The wagon was not a wagon at all, not truly. It was a traveling archive.

Alias forgot the rain. He forgot the tavern. He forgot that he was cold. His tail brushed against a stack of journals as he turned, nearly knocking them loose before he caught them with one hand. The tip flicked once in irritation. Some habits proved difficult to hide, even when nobody was watching.

For one wild moment, he forgot even to be cautious. Here was a thing he had never imagined but immediately understood: a life built from records, a road that carried memory instead of cargo. He climbed inside.

The floor creaked but held. Lantern light revealed labels written in several hands. Roads of Northern Vaelor. Bridge Conditions, Various Years. Unverified Structures. Weather Anomalies. Personal Accounts. Lost Settlements. Questions Without Answers. That last one caught him by the throat. Questions without answers were usually mocked, ignored, or buried beneath certainty. Here they had a shelf.

He opened the nearest journal with reverence he usually reserved for meals he had not paid for. The first page contained a date, location, weather, and a careful description of a mountain road. Distances were measured. Landmarks sketched. Dangers noted. It resembled his own notebook so strongly that for a moment he felt as though a stranger had reached across time and stolen a habit from his hands.

At the rear of the wagon stood a narrow desk. An ink bottle rested there, sealed but not dusty. Several pages lay stacked beside it. A chair had been pushed back, as though someone had stood in a hurry and meant to return. The personalness of it unsettled him more than the driverless arrival. An impossible wagon could be called magic. An empty chair was absence.

He found the first note tucked inside a journal newer than the rest. The paper was older than the book around it, folded many times and soft at the creases. Most of the ink had faded, but fragments remained: to the next keeper, knowledge must continue, do not let the road end. The words did not feel like instruction. They felt like a hand reaching out just before disappearing.

Something metallic shifted beneath the desk. The sound was small, almost swallowed by rain, but in that space it seemed enormous. Alias crouched, moved a stack of papers, and found a coin half-hidden against the wall. It was not any currency he knew. No king, guild, province, or merchant house had stamped its claim upon it. Both sides bore worn markings similar to those carved outside, though smaller, finer, almost too delicate for metal.

It was cold when he picked it up. Not winter cold. Deeper. The kind of cold found in stones at the bottom of wells.

For an instant one of the markings seemed to move. Alias blinked. The coin remained still. Probably. 'Alias!' Gerhardt shouted from the tavern. 'Are you alive?' 'Yes!' A pause. Then: 'Are you sure?' Some laughter reached him even through the storm. Alias slipped the coin into his pocket before he could decide whether that was wise. The answer, he suspected, was no. Wisdom rarely arrived before curiosity in his life.

When he stepped back into the tavern much later, soaked through and carrying more questions than water, Gerhardt was waiting with a towel, a scowl, and a bowl of stew he pretended was not free. Alias did not tell him everything at once. Some discoveries needed silence around them before words could be trusted.

But before sleeping, in the small room above The Wandering Lantern, Alias opened his notebook and wrote until the candle nearly died. He described the wagon, the shelves, the desk, the note, and the coin. He wrote the fragments carefully. To the next keeper. Knowledge must continue. Do not let the road end. Then, because honestly demanded it, he added one final line beneath the rest: I think something has found me.

Chapter 3: The Keeper's Message

Morning did not make the wagon less strange. It only made Maanhaven more confident about having opinions. By sunrise a crowd had formed in the square. Fishermen stood with arms crossed, offering theories in tones that suggested long experience with driverless archives. Merchants speculated on ownership. Children dared each other to touch the wheels.

The off-duty guard from the tavern returned in uniform, circled the wagon once, and announced that no immediate crime had been identified. This satisfied no one but relieved him greatly.

Alias came downstairs after very little sleep and found Gerhardt already behind the counter. The foxfolk slid a cup of tea toward him before he asked. That alone was suspicious. Gerhardt was generous, but not careless with tea. 'You look terrible,' Gerhardt said. 'Good morning.' 'It is not good yet. That depends on what you tell me.'

Alias placed the coin on the counter. Morning light caught its surface. Gerhardt's expression changed before he could hide it. Recognition again, quick as a match strike. Alias leaned forward. 'You have seen this.' Gerhardt picked it up with two fingers, turned it once, and set it down. 'No.' 'That was too fast.' 'I have heard stories.' 'Helpful stories?' 'Stories are rarely helpful while they are happening.'

Alias hated that because it sounded true. Gerhardt refused to explain further until Alias ate something, which was unfair but effective. Hunger weakened all arguments eventually. When the bowl was empty, they crossed the square together. The crowd parted more readily for Gerhardt than for the guard. Tavern keepers knew everyone's secrets; wise towns respected them accordingly.

Inside the wagon, daylight revealed what lantern light had only suggested. The collection was vast, organized, and old. Maris Veylen was not yet there to appreciate this properly, so Alias had to feel enough wonder for both of them. He showed Gerhardt the shelves, the desk, the first note. The foxfolk touched very little. Mostly he looked, and the longer he looked, the quieter he became.

At the desk, beneath supply lists and travel notes, Alias found a second message. This one had no date, no signature, and no comforting explanation. The handwriting was practical, not elegant, the script of someone who wrote to preserve rather than impress. To whoever finds this archive next, it began. If you are reading these words, then events have unfolded much as I feared.

Either I have failed to return, or the road has decided my journey should end elsewhere. Neither possibility surprises me.

Alias read aloud, though his voice lowered as the message continued. For generations, the archive had been carried by travelers who believed knowledge should survive the people who discovered it. Some contributed one page. Others devoted years.

No one owned it. No one controlled it. They only protected it, added to it, and passed it onward when the road demanded.

Then came the line that made the coin feel heavier in his pocket. If the coin has revealed itself, then the archive has already chosen.

Gerhardt closed his eyes. 'You knew,' Alias said. 'I suspected.' 'That is what people say when they knew.' 'It is also what people say when they suspected.' Alias looked back at the page. The final section was damaged or unfinished. Fragments remained: do not follow the first answer, the Structures are older than the stories, trust companions before certainty. The last complete sentence read, The road begins where curiosity refuses to stop. He almost laughed. It sounded like a personal attack.

Gerhardt did not laugh. 'You should not go alone.' 'I have not said I am going.' 'Alias.' 'I have not said it out loud.' 'You were gone the moment you opened the door.' The truth of that sat between them. Alias wanted to deny it. He wanted to claim he was only investigating, only recording, only doing what any curious person might do when handed an impossible wagon and an ancient coin.

But denial required distance from the truth, and he was standing inside a wagon full of evidence that someone had expected him. Or someone like him. Or perhaps anyone foolish enough to listen.

He spent the day reading. The archive contained accounts of places called the Structures, though no two writers agreed on what they were. The Archive of Unanswered Questions. The Anchor of Certainty. The Spiral of Becoming. The Reflection of Many Faces. The Spire of Knowing. The Clockwork of Passing Hours. Some names appeared in formal records. Others appeared in margin notes and tavern songs copied by travelers who admitted the songs were probably wrong.

By afternoon a courier arrived with a parcel addressed to Alias Lupus in handwriting no one recognized. Inside was a map. No note. No explanation. A single mark in fresh black ink indicated a location several days east of Maanhaven. Alias had seen the place described in three journals already. The Reflection.

Gerhardt stared at the map for a long while. 'That is convenient.' 'Suspiciously convenient.' 'Convenient things are usually suspicious.' 'Should I ignore it?' Gerhardt looked at him as if he had suggested the sea might ignore the moon. 'Can you?' Alias folded the map carefully. The coin rested in his pocket, cold and silent. The archive surrounded him with the weight of remembered roads.

Outside, Maanhaven continued being Maanhaven: arguing, trading, gossiping, surviving. For a moment he envied the town. Ordinary life had the great advantage of not asking to be understood.

Then he opened his notebook and wrote a new heading:
Travel preparations.

Chapter 4: The First Companions

Gerhardt made the list because Alias would have made the wrong one. Alias's list began with ink, paper, food, spare socks, and perhaps a better knife. Gerhardt's list began with people. This difference, the foxfolk explained, was why Alias should listen to him more often. 'You need someone practical,' Gerhardt said that evening at the round table.

'Someone who sees danger before you begin taking notes about it.' 'I see danger.' 'You describe danger beautifully after it happens.'

That was difficult to refute. The first name was Corvin Ashford, a road surveyor currently in Maanhaven to inspect storm damage near the eastern docks. They found him measuring a cracked support beam with the expression of a man personally insulted by poor construction. Corvin listened to Alias's explanation without interrupting, which made Alias increasingly nervous.

When the story ended, Corvin repeated it back: driverless wagon, traveling archive, ancient coin, anonymous map, mysterious Structure. Then he said, 'Either you are lying, confused, cursed, or involved in the most interesting road problem I have encountered this year.'

'Road problem?' Alias asked. 'Everything is a road problem if approached correctly.' Corvin agreed to come after inspecting the wagon himself. He did not become less skeptical. He simply decided skepticism required fieldwork. Alias wrote that down because it sounded like something Corvin might one day want carved on a grave.

Maris Veylen was found in the town library beneath a tower of books arranged in a system visible only to her. She had ink on her fingers, a pencil tucked behind one ear, and the focused expression of someone who had forgotten meals existed. Alias said the word archive. Maris closed her book. Alias said wagon-sized. Maris stood. Alias said generations of travel records. Maris was halfway to the door before he finished the sentence.

Her first hour inside the wagon was nearly religious. She moved from shelf to shelf, touching nothing until she understood its order, whispering titles, dates, categories.

When she emerged, her eyes shone with the dangerous brightness of a scholar who had found enough work for a lifetime and intended to begin immediately. 'I'm coming,' she said. 'I have not explained the danger.'

'You found a mobile archive connected to undocumented Structures older than recorded settlement patterns. The danger is obvious. So is the opportunity.' Alias suspected she and Corvin would either balance each other perfectly or spend the journey attempting to correct one another into madness.

Rowan Briarlock was found in the market square shortly after jumping from a wagon onto a stack of cargo crates. The jump succeeded. The crates did not. Rowan paid for the damage with the resignation of someone who had budgeted for consequences. He listened to the story with no skepticism whatsoever, which worried Alias more than Corvin's suspicion. 'Ancient Structure?' Rowan asked. 'Possibly.' 'Unknown map sender?' 'Yes.' 'Chance of danger?' 'High.' Rowan grinned. 'Excellent.'

The final name was Eldric Thornvale. He was found in a public garden overlooking the harbor, feeding birds with crumbs and drinking tea from a cup he had somehow brought with him. Eldric was older than the others, though not fragile; his age had settled into him like a well-used cloak.

He listened to Alias's story without surprise. That was suspicious. 'The coin revealed itself?' Eldric asked. 'You know about that?' 'A little.' Alias would come to hate that phrase.

Eldric asked why he truly wanted to go. Alias tried the map, the archive, the coin, the keeper's message. Eldric dismissed each answer with a gentle shake of the head. At last Alias looked toward the harbor and said, 'I want to understand.'

Eldric smiled. 'There it is.'

They gathered that night around the round table at The Wandering Lantern: Alias with his notebook, Corvin with route calculations, Maris with copies from the archive, Rowan with enthusiasm enough to endanger furniture, Eldric with tea, and Gerhardt with the expression of a tavern keeper watching a storm form indoors. Plans became lists. Lists became arguments. Arguments became better plans. By midnight the journey had stopped being a possibility and become a thing with weight.

The evening before departure, Gerhardt brought tea without being asked. The tavern was warm around them. Rain tapped lightly at the windows, gentler now than the storm that had brought the wagon. For a while nobody spoke. Then Gerhardt looked at each of them and said, 'Come back.' It was not dramatic. That made it worse. Alias nodded with the others. Later, in his room, he opened his notebook and wrote only one word on the page: Tomorrow.

Chapter 5: East of Home

Sunrise came quietly. Alias had expected the morning to feel different, as though the world would mark the beginning of the journey with music, omen, or at least weather dramatic enough to respect the occasion. Instead, Maanhaven woke as it always did. Bakers opened shutters. Fishermen shouted from the docks. A dog stole something from a market stall and escaped justice through speed. The town continued without asking whether Alias was ready to leave it.

He stood near the eastern gate with his pack against one shoulder and the coin in his pocket. Corvin arrived first, carrying enough equipment to suggest he planned to survive three separate disasters and judge anyone who survived only two. Maris came next with too many books. Rowan arrived at a run for no reason he could explain. Eldric appeared last, calm and lightly packed, which made everyone else feel excessive.

For a moment they looked back at Maanhaven. The harbor roofs shone in the morning sun. The Wandering Lantern's sign swung above the square, small from this distance but still visible. Gerhardt stood outside the tavern door with his arms folded. He did not wave. Gerhardt was not a waving sort of person. But he watched until they started down the road, and that was better.

The first miles were easy in the deceptive way first miles often are. Boots had not yet blistered. Packs had not yet become unreasonable. Spirits had not yet encountered rain, hunger, or Rowan's theories about ancient traps. The road passed through farmland washed clean by the storm. Stone walls divided fields. Farmers waved. Dogs barked with professional suspicion.

By midday Rowan asked whether the Reflection was likely to contain traps. Corvin told him not to hope for traps. Maris said traps made little sense if the Structures were pedagogical rather than defensive. Rowan asked whether pedagogical traps counted. Eldric said he had once known a teacher who would have approved of the phrase. Alias wrote most of it down.

The road narrowed by afternoon as farmland gave way to trees. The settlements thinned. Birds called from branches. Mud clung to their boots. Maanhaven disappeared behind low hills, then returned briefly from the top of a rise, smaller than Alias expected and harder to look at than he wanted. Leaving did not hurt in the way he thought it would. It tugged. A quiet pull beneath the ribs.

Near sunset they reached an abandoned watchtower marked on Corvin's map. It stood on a hill above the forest, roof broken, walls furred with moss. The tower felt old but not ancient. Old places remembered people. Ancient places seemed to have forgotten the need. Inside, stone stairs spiraled upward around a hollow center. Rowan climbed first, which caused several stones to fall and Corvin to reconsider the value of companionship.

At the top, the view opened in every direction. The road wound behind them like a pale thread. Far away, Maanhaven rested beneath the evening light. Ahead lay forest and hills, and somewhere beyond them the Reflection. Alias reached into his pocket. The coin was cold.

At first he thought the chill came from the wind. Then the coin pulsed, a brief sensation like a second heartbeat in his palm. Moss on the tower wall shivered though no breeze touched it. A symbol appeared beneath the green, lines of the same impossible language carved into the wagon. Maris copied it. Corvin measured it. Rowan suggested secret doors. Eldric watched the coin. The symbol gave no answer, but it changed the journey.

Until that moment, the mystery had lived in maps, notes, and old stories. Now it had appeared in stone beneath their hands.

That night they camped beneath trees while the first stars gathered overhead. The fire burned low. The group argued theories until laughter softened the edges of fear. Alias sat slightly apart, notebook open, and realized he was not lonely. The realization surprised him enough that he wrote it down.

Later, near midnight, the coin showed a thin line of silver across its face. Far beyond the trees, a matching light flickered and vanished.

Something was waiting ahead. Or guiding them. Or warning them. Alias did not know which possibility unsettled him more. But when a faint song drifted through the dark, wordless and distant, he understood that the Reflection was no longer only a destination. It had become aware of their approach.

Chapter 6: The First Wrong Turn

Nobody followed the song that night. This disappointed Rowan and relieved everyone else. Corvin called the decision survival. Rowan called it cowardice with better posture. Maris called it a lack of data. Eldric called it sensible, which settled the matter only because arguing with Eldric before sunrise felt like arguing with fog.

Morning made the forest less frightening and more complicated. The light they had seen left no trail, but the coin pulsed whenever Alias faced northeast, away from the road marked on the map. Corvin disliked this intensely. 'Maps exist for a reason,' he said. Rowan replied, 'So do mysterious lights.' Maris suggested they follow the anomaly long enough to determine whether it connected to the Reflection. Eldric looked at Alias. That was unfair. Everyone looking at Alias had become unfair.

Alias tried to decide like a leader, then remembered he had never asked to be one. He was the reason they were there, which was not the same thing as being qualified. The coin rested cold in his palm. The map pointed east. The feeling in his bones pointed northeast. He thought of the keeper's message: do not follow the first answer.

Then he thought of Gerhardt saying trust companions before certainty. 'We go northeast until noon,' he said. 'If we find nothing, we return to the road.'

Corvin accepted this because it included a limit. Rowan accepted it because it involved leaving the path. Maris accepted it because everything could become research if written down properly. Eldric accepted it because he had likely known the decision before Alias spoke.

The forest thickened quickly. Roots crossed the ground like sleeping serpents. Brambles grabbed at cloaks. Twice Corvin stopped to mark trees so they could find their way back. Rowan called this unnecessary. Ten minutes later Rowan became turned around and declared Corvin's marks a brilliant system. Corvin did not look pleased by being proven right. He looked accustomed to it.

Near midday they found the stones. Not a structure, not exactly. A ring of low markers half-buried beneath leaves, each carved with symbols worn almost smooth. In the center lay a shallow depression filled with rainwater. The surface reflected the sky though the forest canopy should have blocked it. Alias knelt beside it. The coin warmed.

Maris whispered that the carvings matched no known regional style. Corvin observed that the stones had been placed with deliberate alignment. Rowan asked whether touching the water would be educational. Everyone said no at once. Then the reflection in the water changed.

It did not show the sky. It showed a hallway lined with mirrors, moonlight on polished metal, and a doorway standing open. Alias leaned closer despite every sensible part of himself objecting. For the briefest moment he saw his own face reflected in the water, then another over it: older, hooded, unfamiliar, almost human. He blinked and the image vanished.

'Alias?' Maris asked. He did not answer immediately. The water reflected trees again. The coin cooled in his hand. Somewhere far away, the wordless song returned for a single note, then faded. Corvin crouched beside him. 'We should leave.' 'Yes,' Alias said, though he remained where he was.

'Now.' This time Alias stood. He wrote what he had seen while his hand still remembered the shape of it.

The unknown face bothered him. Not because it seemed threatening. Because it seemed possible. A face he might one day choose, or need, or become. He did not yet have the name Varux Hyborea. But in that rainwater mirror, something like Varux looked back.

They returned to the main road after noon, later than promised but alive. Corvin made a note about future time estimates being unreliable when ancient anomalies were involved. Rowan asked whether ancient anomalies counted as landmarks. Maris began drafting three theories. Eldric walked beside Alias in silence until the young wolffolk finally asked what the water had shown him. Eldric's answer was gentle. 'A question wearing a face.' Alias hated how much sense that made once he stopped wanting it not to.

Chapter 7: The Reflection's Door

The Reflection did not appear at the end of a grand road. There was no marble stair, no carved gate announcing itself to travelers, no statues of forgotten kings pointing toward destiny. It waited in a valley hidden by ordinary trees, reached by an ordinary deer trail that Corvin distrusted because it was not on the map. The only sign they had arrived was the coin growing warm enough that Alias felt it through the fabric of his pocket.

The valley floor held a circle of standing mirrors taller than any person. They were not glass, not exactly, but polished metal or stone that caught the afternoon light and bent it strangely. Vines grew around their bases without touching the reflective surfaces. In the center stood an archway carved with words Maris translated only after comparing six copied inscriptions and arguing with herself twice: The Reflection of Many Faces.

Rowan stood very still. 'I feel like this is the sort of place where touching things is discouraged.' Corvin looked surprised. 'That may be the wisest thing you've said all week.' 'I contain multitudes.' 'Please contain them quietly.'

The mirrors showed them, but not simply. Corvin's reflection stood with maps in hand, then without them, then as a young boy staring at a broken bridge. Maris saw herself older, surrounded by books, then younger, crying over a page torn in half. Rowan laughed when his reflection appeared wearing a crown made of sticks, then stopped laughing when another showed him alone at a table with no one to entertain. Eldric's reflections were too many and too brief to count.

Alias avoided looking until avoidance became ridiculous. When he finally faced the nearest mirror, he saw himself as he was: gray ears, travel-stained cloak, tired eyes, notebook clutched like a shield. Then the face shifted. Human. Hooded. Masked. Older. Smiling with practiced calm. Another face followed: younger, frightened, hungry outside a bakery window. Another: a thief's quick glance. Another: a scholar bent over notes. Another: a friend leaving before dawn.

He stepped back. The mirror did not release him. Words appeared across its surface, not carved but written in light: One self. Many faces. Alias swallowed. The others had gone quiet around him. He realized, with irritation and fear, that the Structure was not showing possible futures only. It was showing truths he already carried but had not named. He wanted to call it cruel. He wanted to call it magic nonsense. He wanted to write everything down so quickly that feeling could be postponed until later.

Instead he stood there. The coin warmed in his palm. The mirror's surface rippled, and for a moment he saw not only himself but the round table at The Wandering Lantern, Gerhardt's worried eyes, the archive waiting in the square, and a blank page with a name he could not read. Then the image collapsed into his own reflection once more.

Eldric came to stand beside him. 'The Reflection does not tell you who to be.' 'Then what does it do?' Alias asked. 'It makes it harder to pretend you do not choose.' That was, in Alias's opinion, an unnecessarily personal thing for an ancient Structure to do.

They remained in the valley until dusk, recording what they could. No one left unchanged, though none of them said so plainly. As moonlight touched the mirrors, each surface turned toward the sky instead of the travelers. The archway dimmed. The Structure had shown them what it intended to show, and like all frustrating teachers, it did not care whether they felt ready to understand the lesson.

That night, Alias wrote longer than anyone else. He described the faces. Not all of them. Some felt too private even for paper. But he wrote the line. One self. Many faces. Then he added beneath it: If that is true, why does one face feel easier to wear than another? He did not know then how important that question would become. He only knew that when they left the valley the next morning, the road ahead felt wider, stranger, and less kind than before.

Part II: The Road Beyond Reflection

Chapter 8: The Morning After Mirrors

The morning after the Reflection did not look like the morning after anything. Sunlight moved through the valley in pale bands, catching on dew and polished metal until every leaf seemed to hold a smaller sky. Birds argued in the branches with no respect for ancient mysteries. Corvin checked their packs. Maris tried to compare six contradictory notes while eating breakfast.

Rowan attempted to make eye contact with every mirror to see whether any still wished to insult him. Eldric made tea as though the world had not just shown each of them pieces of themselves they would have preferred to keep unexamined.

Alias sat a little apart from the others with his notebook balanced against his knee. The words from the mirror remained clear in his mind, cleaner than most memories ever allowed themselves to be. One self. Many faces. He had written the line the night before, underlined it twice, and then stared at it until the ink seemed tired of him. The problem was not understanding the sentence.

The problem was understanding why it felt less like a lesson and more like a door he had not meant to open.

He had always known he changed himself for different roads. Everyone did, in small ways. A traveler learned which smile brought cheaper lodging, which silence made dangerous people forget you were there, which tone convinced a merchant you were too useful to underpay. Alias had learned those things earlier than most. Hiding his hunger became easier than explaining it. Hiding his fear became easier than trusting it with someone else. Hiding the blank places in his memory became easier than admitting they were there at all.

The Reflection had made hiding feel childish. Not useless, exactly. A cloak was still useful in rain. A mask could still keep a person alive. But it had shown him the danger of mistaking the cloak for skin. That thought followed him as the group packed camp and prepared to leave the valley. Every time he passed a mirror, he saw only himself, ordinary and travel-worn, which somehow felt more unsettling than the visions had.

Rowan finally gave up trying to provoke the mirrors and joined him near the archway. 'I think one of them showed me becoming king.' Alias looked over. 'Of where?' 'Unclear. Possibly a very small kingdom. Maybe a shed.' 'Did the shed prosper?' 'Briefly.' Rowan folded his arms, staring at the nearest reflective surface with exaggerated suspicion. 'Then it showed me alone, which was rude. Ancient magic should have better manners.'

Alias closed his notebook. 'Maybe it showed what mattered.' Rowan's grin faltered for less than a second, but Alias saw it.

The masks people wore did not always look like masks. Sometimes they looked like jokes. Rowan kicked a pebble into the grass and shrugged. 'If it mattered, it could have said so with less dramatic lighting.'

Corvin called them back before the conversation could become honest enough to frighten either of them. The surveyor had chosen a route that returned them to the main road without retracing every step. He explained this with a map spread over a flat stone, pointing at ridges, old drainage lines, and the likely position of a disused hunters' path. Rowan asked whether the hunters were disused or the path was. Corvin ignored him with the practiced skill of a man preserving his sanity.

They left the Reflection just before noon. No door closed behind them. No mirror flashed. No ancient voice thanked them for attending. The valley simply remained as it had been, quiet and bright, as if the group had imagined everything. Alias looked back only once. In the central mirror, for a heartbeat, he thought he saw a hooded face watching from where his reflection should have been.

Then a cloud crossed the sun, and the image vanished. He wrote it down later, but not immediately. Some things needed to sit in silence before they became ink.

The road beyond the valley felt different from the road that had led them there. It was not the land that had changed. The trees still leaned over the path. Insects still rose from grass. Mud still found every weakness in a boot. What had changed was the group. They walked closer now, though none of them said so. Corvin still checked the map, but he glanced at Alias before choosing direction.

Maris still took notes, but sometimes she watched her companions instead of the ruins. Rowan still talked too much, but not during the quiet moments after someone had been lost in thought. Eldric, naturally, seemed to have expected all of this and was therefore extremely annoying.

Near evening they found a carved marker beside the road. It was not large, only a waist-high stone leaning slightly beneath moss and lichen. Corvin might have dismissed it as a boundary marker if the coin had not grown cold. Maris cleared the moss with careful fingers, revealing lines of the same old script they had seen on the wagon, the watchtower, and the mirrors.

This time there were words beneath the symbol in a newer language, still old but readable enough for Maris to attempt.

She translated slowly. 'Those who seek answers often arrive carrying the wrong questions.' Rowan sighed. 'Of course they do.' Corvin frowned at the road ahead. 'Is that a warning?' 'Possibly,' Maris said. 'Or an insult.' 'Can it be both?' Alias asked. Eldric smiled into his tea cup, which he had somehow produced without anyone noticing. 'Most useful warnings are.'

Alias copied the phrase carefully. The wrong questions. He looked back toward the direction of the Reflection, then ahead into the trees. The journey had begun because he wanted to understand the coin, the archive, the map, the Structures. Yet the mirror had cared less about those than about the face he wore while asking. It was a deeply inconvenient possibility that the mystery might not be about what he wanted to know, but why he needed to know it.

That night they camped beside a stand of pine trees while clouds gathered above the hills. The air smelled of sap and rain. Alias listened to Corvin and Maris argue over whether the marker was a navigational aid, a philosophical statement, or evidence that whoever built the Structures had enjoyed being difficult. Rowan declared that difficult ancient builders were better than boring ancient builders.

Eldric said boring builders tended to make safer staircases. Everyone agreed with that except Rowan, who felt accused.

When the fire burned low, Alias opened his notebook to the sketch of his parents. The faces remained blank. He had hoped the Reflection might disturb them somehow, sharpen them, reveal a hidden truth, give him even one feature he could trust. It had not. The blankness stayed blank. He touched the edge of the page and wondered whether he had been carrying the wrong question for years.

Perhaps asking who they were was less important than asking what he feared would happen if he never learned. That question was worse. It sat heavier. He did not write it down yet.

In the dark beyond camp, something silver flickered once between the trees. No one else seemed to notice. The coin remained still in his pocket. Alias watched until the darkness returned to being only darkness. Then he slept badly and dreamed of mirrors turned toward the moon.

Chapter 9: Weather That Listens

Rain found them two days later, though not with the fury of the storm that had brought the wagon to Maanhaven. This rain was patient. It began as mist clinging to hair and sleeves, then thickened into a steady fall that softened the road and turned every leaf glossy. The group pulled up hoods and continued, because stopping for every rain in western Vaelor meant spending half one's life under trees waiting for the sky to become reasonable.

Corvin disliked the road more with every mile. It appeared on his map but not in the world as clearly as he preferred. Sometimes it widened into a proper path with old stones along the edges. Sometimes it dissolved into grass and memory, forcing him to compare slope, tree growth, drainage, and whatever guesses the rest of them insisted on calling intuition. Alias tried to help by watching the coin. This annoyed Corvin because it worked often enough to be difficult to dismiss.

'A compass points north,' Corvin said after the third time the coin's chill pulled them away from the visible road. 'That object points toward bad decisions.' 'Useful distinction,' Rowan said. 'Most great stories point that way too.' 'I am not navigating by story quality.' 'Maybe you should. Your map has led us into two bogs.' 'One bog.' 'The second was emotionally a bog.'

Maris walked between them, holding a waxed cover over her notes. She had spent the morning comparing the marker phrase with copied entries from the archive and had become increasingly convinced that the Structures were not arranged randomly. Their locations formed no clean map, no simple circle or line, but their lessons seemed to follow a sequence in the journals.

Travelers who reached the Reflection before the Archive wrote very different accounts from those who reached the Archive first. Some described confusion. Some described anger. A few refused to record what they saw at all.

'The order matters,' she said as they paused beneath a leaning oak. Rain dripped from its branches in fat drops. 'Not geographically, perhaps, but personally. The same Structure may not do the same thing to different people, or even to the same person at a different time.' 'So the old records are inconsistent because the Structures are inconsistent?' Alias asked. 'No. Because people are.'

Eldric nodded as if she had said something obvious and deeply satisfying. Rowan looked betrayed. 'I preferred when ancient magic was the problem.' 'People are nearly always the problem,' Corvin said. 'Ancient magic is often just the decoration.'

They reached the village of Old Fen by evening. Village was a generous word. It consisted of a mill, twelve houses, a shrine to a rain saint no one could name confidently, and an inn with a roof that sagged in the middle like it had given up arguing with gravity. The sign above the door read The Bent Nail. Rowan declared it charming. Corvin declared it structurally concerning. Both were correct.

Inside, the inn smelled of peat smoke, onion soup, and wet wool. The common room was small, but the fire was large enough to forgive many sins. The innkeeper, a broad-shouldered woman named Sella, looked over the group with the calm assessment of someone who had seen enough travelers to know which ones would pay, which ones would complain, and which ones would accidentally break furniture. Her eyes lingered on Rowan. Rowan smiled. Sella pointed at him. 'You pay for anything you damage.' Rowan's smile became respectful. 'Yes, ma'am.'

They took a table near the hearth. For the first time since leaving Maanhaven, Alias felt the strange comfort of walls around him. Travel made every roof feel like kindness. He ate soup too quickly, burned his tongue, and pretended not to because Rowan was watching. Maris asked Sella whether the village had records of older roads in the area. Sella asked whether Maris planned to pay for dinner with questions. Maris paid in coin, then asked again. This, apparently, was acceptable.

Old Fen did have stories. All villages did, though some hid them beneath practical concerns until strangers asked correctly. Sella spoke of a hollow library beneath the northern trees where people left questions they could not answer. Her grandmother had called it a saint's cellar. Her mother had called it a scholar trap.

The miller claimed his cousin had gone there to ask where his missing goat had wandered and returned with a lifelong fear of blank paper. No one could confirm the goat's opinion.

Alias felt the coin cool against his side as Sella spoke. Maris noticed his expression and stopped writing. Corvin noticed Maris stopping and sighed before anyone said the obvious. Rowan said it anyway. 'We're going to the terrifying question cellar, aren't we?' 'Not tonight,' Corvin said. 'No one suggested tonight.' 'Your face suggested tonight.' 'My face suggests many things. Ignore most of them.'

Eldric asked Sella whether the place had a name. The innkeeper shrugged. 'Depends who you ask. Old Question House. Root Library. The Place Under Trees. My gran called it the Archive of Unanswered Questions when she wanted us to behave.' Maris nearly dropped her spoon. Alias looked into his soup because sometimes the world confirmed old records so neatly it felt like being mocked.

The rain strengthened overnight. From the narrow room he shared with Rowan, Alias listened to water run from the roof and drip into a bucket somewhere down the hall. Rowan slept immediately, with the unfair peace of someone whose conscience had never learned proper working hours. Alias envied him. He opened his notebook by candlelight and wrote Sella's stories, the names, the goat detail, the rain saint, the sagging roof. Not because all of it mattered. Because he had learned not to decide too early what would matter later.

Before closing the notebook, he turned again to the sketch of the blank faces. The paper looked older in the candlelight. He thought about the Archive waiting beneath roots, a place where questions were kept rather than answered. For the first time, he wondered whether he feared the Structure because it might fail to answer him, or because it might understand exactly why he was asking. Outside, thunder muttered across the fields. In his pocket, the coin remained cold until dawn.

Chapter 10: The Archive of Unanswered Questions

The path to the Archive began behind the mill, crossed a field of wet grass, and entered a stand of trees older than the village. Sella warned them not to trust straight lines beneath those branches. Her grandmother had said the forest disliked impatience. Corvin replied that forests had no opinions. Eldric, unhelpfully, said this one might. Corvin spent the next hour irritated at trees.

The rain faded to mist as they walked. Roots crossed the ground in thick knots, forcing them to slow. The world grew quiet in layers. First the village sounds disappeared: mill wheel, voices, chickens complaining about existence. Then the birds thinned. Then even the wind seemed to move more carefully. The coin did not pulse dramatically. It simply remained cold, a small certainty in Alias's pocket, pulling his attention whenever the path divided.

They found the entrance shortly before noon. It was not grand. No statues guarded it. No carved arch rose from the earth. A set of stone steps descended between two enormous roots, half-hidden by moss and fallen leaves. Above them, on a flat stone nearly swallowed by bark, words had been cut in an old formal script. Maris brushed them clean with shaking fingers and translated in a whisper. 'The Archive of Unanswered Questions.'

Nobody joked. Even Rowan seemed to understand that some places asked for quiet before anyone entered. The steps descended into cool darkness. Corvin tested each one. Maris protested the delay until the third step shifted slightly beneath his boot, at which point she became deeply supportive of caution. Below, the air smelled of stone, paper, and rain that had not seen sky in a very long time.

The Archive opened wider than the entrance promised. Shelves curved along walls carved directly into earth and stone. Roots threaded through the ceiling without breaking it, forming dark arches overhead. Lamps burned with pale blue light though no flame fed them.

Books stood beside tablets, scrolls, loose pages, wooden plaques, knotted cords, and objects Alias could not immediately identify as records until Maris explained three possibilities and admitted all might be wrong.

Unlike the wagon archive, this place was not organized by subject. It was organized by questions. Each shelf bore a phrase. Why do roads return? What is lost when a name is forgotten? Can a lie become shelter? Who decides when a journey ends? Some shelves held thousands of pages. Others held one. A few were empty except for labels waiting patiently for someone to arrive with the right uncertainty.

Alias moved slowly. The silence pressed against him, but not cruelly. It was the silence of a room listening. He passed questions that made him smile, questions that made him uncomfortable, questions so ordinary they felt holy. Why does my bread never rise? Where did the blue birds go? Did she know I was sorry? Why do I dream of a house that burned before I was born? He wanted to read everything. He wanted to run. Both desires were becoming familiar companions.

At the center of the chamber stood a lectern made from pale stone. It held no book. The surface was smooth except for a shallow outline the size of an open journal. Alias knew before anyone spoke that it was waiting for him. He disliked that.

Ancient places should have the courtesy to pretend not to be personal.

'You do not have to,' Eldric said quietly. Alias almost asked how he knew, then decided the answer would probably be 'a little' and saved himself the irritation. He placed his notebook on the lectern. The moment the cover touched stone, the pages turned by themselves, slowly at first, then faster, flipping through roads, sketches, weather, jokes, copied symbols, Gerhardt's insults, travel lists, and finally stopping near the back.

The unfinished sketch of his parents lay open beneath the blue lamps. The blank faces stared upward. Alias felt the air leave him. For a heartbeat he was a child again, or the memory of one, standing in smoke and noise with hands pulling him away from something he could not see clearly enough to mourn properly. He gripped the edge of the lectern. The room did not move. The others did not speak.

No answer appeared. No faces filled themselves in. No kind magic restored what time, fear, or injury had taken. Instead, a fresh page slid into view beside the sketch. Ink formed slowly across it in a hand that was not his: A question preserved is not a question solved.

Alias hated the sentence with immediate sincerity. It felt like being offered an empty bowl after admitting hunger. His first thought was that the Structure was useless. His second was worse: perhaps it had given him exactly what it promised. Not an answer. A place for the question to remain without pretending it did not matter.

Maris was crying silently. She looked angry about it, which Alias appreciated. Corvin had removed his hat. Rowan stood unnaturally still. Eldric watched Alias with something like sorrow and patience, and Alias nearly resented him for both. He closed the notebook carefully. His hands trembled only a little. "That's all?" Rowan asked, not mocking, only wounded on Alias's behalf. The Archive gave no reply. Perhaps it had already said what it meant to say. Perhaps it never answered questions because answers were too easy to mistake for endings.

They spent the rest of the day recording what they could. Maris copied shelf labels until her fingers cramped. Corvin mapped the chamber. Rowan discovered a section labeled Questions Asked by Children and refused to explain why he stayed there for nearly an hour. Eldric found a bench beneath roots and read a single page for so long that Alias wondered whether it contained a question he had carried longer than any of them had been alive.

Before they left, Alias returned to the lectern alone. He opened his notebook to the blank faces and placed one hand over the page. 'I still want to know,' he whispered. The Archive remained silent. That was all right. Wanting to know was not the same as being ready to stop at the first answer. He copied the sentence beneath the sketch in his own hand. A question preserved is not a question solved. Then he added:

But it is not abandoned either.

When they climbed back into the misting afternoon, the forest seemed louder than before. Birds called. Water dripped from leaves. Somewhere far off, the mill turned in Old Fen. The world had not changed, but Alias had. Not healed. Not answered. Changed. He carried the old question still, but it no longer felt like a hole. It felt like a page waiting for more than one line.

Chapter 11: Questions by Firelight

They did not speak much on the way back to Old Fen. Even Rowan, who generally considered silence an illness requiring immediate treatment, walked with unusual care. The Archive followed them in ways stone rooms should not follow people. It lingered behind the eyes. It made every ordinary question feel larger. What would they eat? Where would they sleep?

Was the bridge ahead safe?

Each carried a shadow of something deeper: what do people need, where do they belong, what can be trusted to hold?

Sella took one look at them when they entered The Bent Nail and said nothing at all. She brought stew, bread, and hot cider without asking. The inn's common room was quieter than the night before. Rain tapped the roof. The mill wheel creaked outside. A pair of locals played tiles in the corner, their pieces clicking softly against the table. Ordinary sounds. Necessary sounds. Alias clung to them more than he expected.

Maris filled six pages before eating. Corvin cleaned mud from his boots with the focus of a man restoring order to the universe. Rowan stared into his bowl until Alias nudged him.

'You alive?' Rowan blinked. 'Mostly.' 'That's usually my answer.' 'I borrowed it.'

The joke helped. Not much, but enough. By the time they returned to their rooms, the group had begun speaking again in fragments. Maris wanted to compare the Archive's shelf labels against the wagon records. Corvin wanted to determine whether the Structure's interior space matched the hill above it, which it almost certainly did not. Rowan wanted to know whether there was a shelf for questions asked by dogs. Eldric said there should be, as dogs generally asked better questions than kings.

They left Old Fen the next morning with fresh supplies, a repaired strap on Maris's pack, and three warnings from Sella not to follow singing lights unless they intended to become village stories. Rowan asked whether becoming a village story came with benefits. Sella told him it came with fewer living relatives. Rowan accepted the warning with dignity.

For two days the road carried them through low hills and wet meadows. Spring flowers grew along ditches. Farmers worked fields beneath wide hats. At night they camped under open sky, and the stars returned in such number that Alias found himself sketching them rather than writing. He had always liked stars. They were records of a sort: old light arriving late, proof that distance did not always mean disappearance.

On the second night after the Archive, the conversation finally returned to the lectern. It happened slowly. Maris began by admitting she had expected the Structure to answer something. Corvin said he distrusted any place that claimed not to answer while clearly influencing people. Rowan asked whether the Archive had failed or succeeded by refusing. Eldric made tea and let them build the question large enough to sit beneath.

'Maybe it keeps questions because people are too quick to throw them away,' Alias said at last. He had not planned to speak. The words arrived anyway. 'If something cannot be solved, people call it useless. If it hurts, they bury it. If it takes too long, they pretend they never cared. But the Archive kept them. Even the foolish ones. Even the ones that sounded impossible.'

Rowan leaned back against his pack. 'Especially the foolish ones, I hope.' 'Yours would need a separate wing,' Corvin said. Rowan placed a hand over his heart. 'Finally, recognition.'

Alias laughed. The sound surprised him. It did not erase the ache from the Archive, but it lived beside it comfortably enough. That seemed important. Pain did not always demand the whole room. Sometimes it could sit by the fire while other things continued: jokes, tea, the scratch of Maris's pen, Corvin pretending not to enjoy the company, Eldric looking pleased whenever no one watched him closely.

Later, when the others slept, Alias wrote about them. Not the mystery. Not the coin. Them. Corvin's habit of checking knots after everyone else tied them. Maris whispering to difficult texts as though they were stubborn animals. Rowan's fearlessness, which Alias increasingly suspected was not lack of fear but refusal to let fear become lonely.

Eldric's silences, which were beginning to feel less like withheld answers and more like space left for others to find their own.

He wrote a sentence and stared at it for a long while. Home is not always the place you leave from. Sometimes it is the people who keep showing up beside your fire. He considered crossing it out for being too sentimental. Instead he underlined it once.

The coin lay beside the notebook, reflecting firelight. It did not glow. It did not pulse. It simply remained there, a reminder, if Eldric was right. Alias was beginning to think reminders were more dangerous than keys. Keys opened doors. Reminders made it impossible to pretend doors were not there.

Beyond the firelight, the road waited. The next Structure named in the records was the Anchor of Certainty. The journals disagreed on its location, its purpose, and whether finding it was wise. On one point, however, they agreed completely: everyone who entered came out with an answer. None agreed whether that was a blessing.

Chapter 12: Toward the Anchor

The land changed as they traveled south-east. Forest thinned into open country, then widened into plains where wind moved freely and clouds cast shadows large enough to feel like weather of their own. Roads crossed and separated without the comforting certainty of signposts. Corvin became increasingly valuable and increasingly smug about it. Rowan attempted to navigate once by instinct and led them to a pond full of frogs.

He claimed the frogs might have been significant. Maris recorded the claim under local fauna rather than prophecy.

The Anchor appeared in stories long before it appeared in sight. At a roadside shrine, an old caretaker told them it was a stone that could not be moved. In the next village, a wheelwright claimed it was a hall beneath the ground where liars lost their tongues. A shepherd said his grandfather had gone to ask whether he should marry a woman from the next valley and returned so certain that no one could stand speaking with him again.

Every story agreed that the Anchor gave truth. Every story disagreed on whether truth improved anything.

Corvin liked the idea of a place that provided certainty. Maris distrusted it on scholarly grounds, arguing that certainty without method was merely authority wearing nicer clothes.

Rowan asked whether he could ask where to find buried treasure. Eldric said the Anchor might answer. Rowan looked delighted until Eldric added that answers were rarely obligated to be pleasant.

Alias said little. The Archive still lived in him. A question preserved is not a question solved. The Anchor, if the records were even half accurate, offered the opposite: a question solved so completely that the road beyond it might vanish. He wanted that. He wanted it badly enough to distrust himself. Who were his parents? What had happened to them? Why did memory break when he reached for them?

The questions had shaped him for so long that he could not imagine setting them down, yet the thought of an answer pulled at him with frightening force.

On the sixth day across the plains, they found a broken caravan camp near a dry creek bed. The ashes were cold, but not old. Wheel marks showed a wagon had tipped and been repaired. A scrap of cloth hung from a thorn bush. Corvin examined the ground and concluded the travelers had left in a hurry but not panic. Maris found a page torn from a journal, its edges burned. Only a few lines remained readable: We asked for certainty and received it. May the road forgive us.

That sentence darkened the afternoon. Rowan made no jokes for nearly an hour. Corvin folded the page carefully and gave it to Maris. Eldric watched the horizon. Alias looked at the coin and wished, not for the first time, that mysterious objects came with instructions written for ordinary people with limited patience.

They camped that night beside the dry creek. Wind moved through the grass in long whispers. Alias dreamed of an enormous stone sunk into the earth while voices around him asked questions in languages he did not know. Each voice received one answer. Each answer became a chain. He woke before dawn with his hand gripping the coin hard enough to leave an imprint on his palm.

Eldric was awake, because Eldric was always awake when inconvenient wisdom might be required. He sat near the remains of the fire, warming his hands around a cup. Alias sat across from him without speaking. The older traveler waited.

This was one of his more irritating strengths.

'If the Anchor can answer,' Alias said finally, 'why shouldn't I ask?' Eldric did not pretend not to understand. 'Because an answer is not the same as readiness.' 'That sounds like something people say when they want to keep answers from someone.' 'Sometimes. Sometimes it is what people say when they have seen answers harm those who thought wanting was enough.'

Alias looked toward the pale line of dawn. 'Do you know what I should ask?' 'No.' 'Do you know what I will ask?' Eldric's smile was sad at the edges. 'A little.' Alias groaned. Eldric's smile warmed. 'You make the phrase sound worse than it is.' 'You make the phrase earn it.'

By midday they saw the Anchor. It stood where three old roads met, though none appeared used anymore. A ring of dark stone surrounded a central pillar driven deep into the earth. No walls enclosed it. No roof covered it. The Structure stood open beneath the sky, plain and severe, as if decoration would have been dishonest. Carved into the central pillar were words Maris translated without difficulty: The Anchor of Certainty.

For once, nobody stepped forward immediately. The wind moved around them. Grass bent and rose. The coin in Alias's hand became heavy, not cold, not warm, but heavy. Corvin removed his hat. Maris closed her notebook. Rowan swallowed. Eldric looked at the Structure as one might look at an old acquaintance whose company had never been comfortable.

Alias thought of the blank faces in his notebook. He thought of the Archive preserving questions without solving them. He thought of the burned journal page: We asked for certainty and received it. May the road forgive us. Then he stepped toward the ring of stone, because wanting an answer and fearing it were not opposites. They were, he was learning, often the same road.

Part III: The Structures

Chapter 13: Roads Between Questions

The days after the Archive of Unanswered Questions did not feel like victory. They felt like walking away from a room that had known too much about them. The forest thinned into hills, and the hills opened into long reaches of grass where the wind moved in waves ahead of them.

The road itself was little more than a pale line pressed through the earth by generations of feet and wheels, sometimes clear, sometimes vanishing beneath weeds, always returning just when Corvin began to look personally offended by its absence.

Alias had expected the group to speak constantly after the Archive. Maris had copied enough notes to fill half a pack.

Rowan had declared the place both depressing and incredible, which was one of his more accurate summaries. Corvin had measured three separate halls and complained that ancient builders seemed uninterested in practical exits.

Eldric had said very little, which was never comforting.

Yet when they finally left the underground shelves and returned to the open sky, conversation came slowly. Some places followed a person out. The Archive was one of them.

By the second evening the silence became less heavy. Rowan attempted to teach everyone a card game whose rules changed whenever he began losing. Corvin accused him of inventing half of it, to which Rowan proudly admitted inventing at least two-thirds. Maris tried to mediate until she realized the game contained no stable structure to mediate. Eldric watched the proceedings over tea with the faint smile of a man witnessing a minor historical disaster.

Alias wrote down every rule Rowan claimed existed, partly for the record and partly because he suspected future generations deserved evidence.

Still, when the fire burned low and the others began to settle into sleep, Alias returned to the journals taken from the wagon archive. He had been copying references to the Structures into a separate section of his notebook, but the more he organized, the less organized the subject became. One account described the Anchor of Certainty as a temple. Another called it a trial.

A third insisted it was a punishment left behind by philosophers who had lost patience with kings. The only agreement was the name, and even that appeared in variations. Certainty. Anchor. The Pillar That Does Not Bend. The Place Where Doubt Dies.

The last one made Alias uncomfortable enough to underline it twice.

He found another passage near midnight in a traveler's account written nearly seventy years earlier. The writer had visited the Reflection, the Archive, and something called the Spire, though the descriptions were maddeningly incomplete.

Near the end of the entry, between a note about spoiled grain and a complaint about a guide who charged too much, was a sentence that held Alias in place: The Structures do not preserve knowledge. They preserve people through knowledge.

Alias read it once. Then again. The words seemed simple, but they opened in the mind like a door with more rooms behind it. He thought of the Archive preserving questions that had outlived those who asked them. He thought of the Reflection showing faces people hid even from themselves. He thought of the wagon and its shelves full of weather, roads, prices, mistakes, jokes, warnings, grief. Perhaps knowledge was not the treasure. Perhaps knowledge was only the shape people left behind when time tried to take them.

Across the fire, Maris stirred in her bedroll without waking. Her hand rested on one of her notebooks as though someone might steal a footnote during the night. Corvin slept with his pack placed precisely where he could reach it. Rowan had somehow rolled halfway off his blanket and was using his own boot as a pillow. Eldric sat awake beneath a tree, because of course he did, looking not at the fire but at the dark road ahead.

Alias closed the journal. The coin rested in his pocket, silent for once. He waited for it to grow cold or warm or provide some dramatic sign that he was thinking in the right direction. It did nothing. That was probably a lesson too, though he resented lessons that required guessing. He opened his notebook and copied the sentence carefully. Beneath it he added his own: Maybe we are not finding the Structures. Maybe the Structures are finding what we carry into them.

The next morning brought a pale sky and wind from the north. Corvin studied the map while frowning deeply enough to suggest geography had insulted him. The road ahead split into two paths, neither marked clearly. One followed the hills eastward, the safer route according to the map. The other climbed north toward a barren plateau described in two journals and one extremely unreliable poem.

The poem mentioned a pillar among clouds and a silence that makes the soul confess. Rowan liked the poem immediately. Corvin disliked it for the same reason.

'We are not choosing a path based on poetry,' Corvin said.

'Not even good poetry?' Rowan asked.

'Especially not bad poetry pretending to be good poetry.'

Maris adjusted the strap of her pack and looked from the map to the northern hills. 'The journals mentioning the Anchor place it somewhere beyond this plateau. Not exactly, but close enough that the poem may have preserved a real landmark.'

'Thank you,' Rowan said. 'The poem has been vindicated.'

'The poem remains terrible,' Maris replied. 'It may also be useful.'

Alias looked north. The hills rose like a slow question against the sky. No light flickered there. The coin gave no reaction. The map offered only uncertainty, which felt appropriate. He thought of the Archive and the line he had copied the night before. Roads between questions were still roads. 'We go north,' he said, and before Corvin could object, he added, 'Slowly. Carefully. With measurements.'

Corvin's objection became less enthusiastic. Rowan called that leadership. Eldric called it compromise. Alias wrote down both words and privately suspected the truth was closer to survival.

Chapter 14: The Anchor of Certainty

The plateau announced itself before the Structure became visible. Grass thinned into scattered patches between stones. Trees fell away until the land opened under a sky too wide for comfort. The wind weakened as they climbed, not stopping all at once but fading gradually, as if each step upward removed another sound from the world. By midday even Rowan had stopped making jokes about the poem. That concerned everyone more than the silence.

The first stones appeared near the crest: low markers set in a rough circle around the highest part of the plateau. They were not tall enough to be walls and not arranged like graves, though Alias found himself walking carefully between them anyway. Each stone bore a single carved line descending from top to base. No curves, no branching symbols, no familiar pattern from the wagon or the Reflection.

Just straight lines, deep and severe, as though someone had tried to carve the concept of refusal into stone.

Then they saw the pillar.

It rose from the center of the plateau with impossible stillness. Massive blocks of dark stone had been fitted together so perfectly that no seam was visible from a distance. The pillar stretched upward far higher than seemed reasonable, its upper reaches disappearing into low clouds that drifted around it like slow water. No birds circled it. No vines climbed it. Nothing softened it. It did not feel abandoned. It felt occupied by its own certainty.

Rowan stopped beside Alias. 'Tell me we are not going inside that.'

Corvin, who had spent the journey arguing in favor of practical investigation, looked equally unhappy. 'For once, I support Rowan's instinctive cowardice.'

'I did not say cowardice.'

'Your posture did.'

Maris was already examining the outer stones, though even her excitement seemed restrained. She traced one inscription without touching it, lips moving silently as she compared shapes to notes from the archive. Eldric remained a few steps behind the group, staring at the pillar with an expression Alias had seen only once before, when Gerhardt touched the coin for the first time. Recognition. Not fear, exactly. Something older and less easily dismissed.

'You know this one,' Alias said.

Eldric did not answer immediately. When he did, his voice was softer than usual. 'Everyone who studies the old roads hears of it eventually. Most accounts contradict each other, but they agree on the name.'

'The Anchor,' Maris said from the stones. 'Of Certainty.'

The words settled over the plateau. Alias disliked how appropriate they felt. The pillar did not invite them. It did not threaten them. It simply stood, undeniable. A thing that did not need to explain itself because explanation suggested doubt.

Corvin walked the outer ring first, marking distances in his notebook. He found three gaps where the stones formed narrow approaches to the pillar. Maris translated fragments from the markers: hold, fix, answer, end. Rowan suggested that any place whose inscriptions included answer and end should be approached from a respectful distance, preferably one measured in miles. Nobody disagreed. They still moved closer.

The entrance was not visible until they reached the base. A narrow doorway had been cut into the pillar, so dark inside that sunlight seemed to stop at the threshold. Above it, a sentence was carved in the same severe script as the stones. Maris studied it for several minutes while the others waited.

Finally she said, 'It is not exactly a warning.'

'That is never a comforting start,' Corvin replied.

'It says, roughly, The answer you hold will hold you in return.'

Rowan took one step back. 'I vote we appreciate that sentence from outside.'

Alias looked into the doorway. His hand drifted toward the coin, but the metal remained still. No warmth. No cold. No pulse. It was almost worse than a warning. He had grown accustomed to the coin being unhelpful, but silence here felt deliberate. As if this choice belonged to them alone.

They entered together because nobody wanted to be the first or last. The air inside the pillar was cool and dry. Their footsteps echoed softly along a corridor that curved inward, descending by degrees too slight to notice until the doorway behind them appeared higher than it should. The walls were smooth except for occasional lines of script, each carved so deeply that shadows gathered inside the letters. Maris read what she could. Truth does not bend. Doubt is the door through which error enters. A divided mind cannot carry the world.

'This place has opinions,' Rowan whispered.

'So do you,' Corvin said.

'Yes, but mine are charming.'

The corridor opened into a circular chamber at the center of the pillar. There was no altar, no statue, no lectern. Only a polished floor and a ceiling lost in darkness above. At the center of the floor a single question had been carved in letters large enough for all of them to read once Maris translated the structure of it: What answer are you willing to stop searching after?

For a long moment nobody spoke. The question did not glow.

It did not echo. It simply waited. Alias felt it enter him anyway, sliding past thought and settling somewhere near the place his oldest memories blurred. What answer would he stop searching after? His parents' names. Their faces. What happened to them. Why he remembered running. Why a child's life could break and leave behind only fragments sharp enough to cut but not enough to explain.

A warmth spread through him, gentle and terrible. Not from the coin. From the chamber. Certainty began as comfort. It whispered that there was an answer, one answer, and if he found it everything else would make sense. The hunger for that answer was so familiar he did not recognize it as danger at first.

Beside him, Corvin straightened. 'We should not go farther without establishing a fixed method of examination.'

'We have a method,' Maris said, too quickly. 'Text first, then spatial mapping, then comparative records.'

'That is your method.'

'It is the correct method.'

Rowan frowned at the carved question. 'I think we should answer it.'

'Absolutely not,' Corvin and Maris said together.

'You do not even know what answering it means,' Corvin added.

'I know what not answering means. It means standing in a creepy pillar arguing until we starve.'

The argument sharpened with frightening speed. Corvin insisted on procedure. Maris insisted on interpretation.

Rowan insisted that action mattered more than endless caution. Alias, listening to them, felt irritation rise like heat. They were wasting time. The answer was somewhere here. He could feel it. If they kept debating, if they kept hesitating, they might lose the chance. Perhaps they had always been too slow. Perhaps companions were not protection but weight.

The thought shocked him for less than a heartbeat before certainty smoothed the shock away. Of course. He needed answers. He had always needed them. The road had brought him here. The coin had chosen him. The archive had chosen him. Why should he wait for others to understand what was already clear?

'Enough,' he said, louder than he meant to.

Everyone turned. Alias heard his own voice continue before wisdom could catch up. 'We are not here to build a perfect report. We are not here to argue until the Structure loses patience. I need to know what this place is trying to show us.'

'You need?' Corvin asked.

The words hung there. Alias heard them too late. Maris's expression changed. Rowan looked between them, energy draining from his face. Eldric, who had said nothing since they entered, closed his eyes as though listening for something beneath the argument.

The chamber seemed to grow more solid around them. The air pressed close. Doubt thinned. Every person stood inside their own certainty, and each certainty had begun to look like truth.

Chapter 15: Certainty

The Anchor did not raise its voice. It did not need to. Its influence worked with the quiet patience of water freezing inside cracks. At first there had been disagreement. Then frustration. Then the conviction that frustration itself proved everyone else was wrong. Alias watched his companions through the strange clarity filling the chamber and could not understand why they resisted what seemed obvious.

Corvin had taken out his measuring cord and was marking distances from the center of the floor to the walls. His movements were sharp, almost angry. 'We cannot interpret anything if we do not know the dimensions. That is the foundation. Without foundation, everything becomes guessing.'

'People have been guessing about these places for centuries,' Maris replied. She had spread notes across the floor despite the lack of wind. Her voice carried a tightness Alias had never heard in it before. 'A measurement without context is just a number. The language matters first.'

'The language has survived centuries. It can survive ten minutes.'

'The Structure may not.'

'Structures do not become impatient.'

Rowan stood near the carved question, arms folded, jaw set. 'Maybe they do. Maybe that is the point. Maybe waiting is the wrong answer.'

'That sentence means nothing,' Corvin snapped.

'It means you are scared to act.'

The silence after that was immediate and ugly. Rowan looked as surprised as anyone by the cruelty of his own words, but certainty closed around him before apology could escape. Corvin's face went still. Maris gathered her notes closer as though defending them from attack.

Alias felt a flare of anger on Corvin's behalf and then, almost in the same breath, anger at all of them for turning the chamber into a battlefield of methods when the question in the floor was clearly meant for him.

Clearly. The word rang inside him. Clearly, certainly, obviously. Dangerous words, though he did not yet recognize them as such.

He stepped toward the center of the chamber. The carved question waited beneath his boots. What answer are you willing to stop searching after? He thought of the sketch in his notebook, the blank faces, the memories that refused to become whole. He thought of waking in places he did not remember reaching, of hunger, theft, kindness given by strangers, Gerhard's stew, his own fear disguised as curiosity. An answer existed. It had to. A life could not be allowed to remain a broken sentence.

The coin in his pocket was silent. That silence felt like permission.

Alias knelt and placed one hand on the carved words. The stone was warm. Images rose instantly behind his eyes: a door, smoke, a woman's hand pushing something into his, a man's voice shouting his name or perhaps another name, running feet, rain, the taste of blood where he had bitten his tongue.

Then a face began to form. Not clear, not complete, but closer than it had ever been. A woman with tired eyes. A smile. Gray ears like his own, though darker at the tips.

He stopped breathing.

'Alias.' Eldric's voice came from far away.

The image sharpened. If he stayed, if he let the Anchor hold him, he knew with impossible certainty that he could see the rest. He could know. He could end the ache. All he had to do was accept the answer, whatever it was, and stop searching beyond it.

A hand gripped his shoulder. Rowan. 'Alias, get up.'

'Let go.'

His own voice sounded wrong. Flat. Certain. He hated Rowan for interrupting, and the hatred frightened a buried part of him so badly that doubt finally found a crack.

Eldric struck the floor with his staff. The sound cracked through the chamber like thunder. Not loud enough to break stone, but loud enough to break rhythm. Everyone flinched.

The images in Alias's mind wavered. The woman's face blurred again, and pain rushed in where certainty had been holding it back.

'Listen to yourselves,' Eldric said.

The words were not magic. That mattered later. They were only words, spoken by someone who had refused to let the chamber make his fear into truth. Eldric stood near the entrance, one hand braced against the wall, face pale with effort. 'Certainty is not courage. It is not wisdom. It is only an anchor. Useful in storms. Deadly if you forget to raise it.'

Maris stared at the notes clutched in her hands. Corvin looked down at his measuring cord as if waking from a dream. Rowan stepped back from Alias, horror entering his expression as he remembered what he had said. Alias remained kneeling over the carved question, shaking. The almost-face of his mother, if it had been his mother, dissolved into fog behind his eyes.

For one terrible moment he wanted to reach for it again. He wanted the chamber to take the pain and replace it with fact. Any fact. Even a cruel one. Maybe especially a cruel one. Cruel answers at least had edges. They could be held. They could be blamed.

Then he remembered the Archive. A question preserved is not a question solved. He had hated that sentence because it asked him to keep carrying what hurt. Now he understood another part of it. Some answers could end a road before the traveler was finished walking.

Alias pulled his hand from the stone.

The warmth vanished. Doubt returned like air after being underwater too long. It hurt. It saved him.

Nobody apologized inside the Anchor. The chamber was not the place for it. They gathered their notes in silence, though Maris's hands trembled, and Corvin repacked his instruments with unnecessary care. Rowan hovered near Alias without touching him, wanting to help and not knowing whether he had the right. Eldric waited until they were all moving before turning toward the entrance.

The corridor out felt longer than the corridor in. The carved sentences on the walls seemed less like wisdom now and more like traps wearing formal clothing. Truth does not bend. Doubt is the door through which error enters. A divided mind cannot carry the world. Alias read them and wondered how many people had mistaken hardness for strength.

Outside, the plateau wind returned all at once. It struck their faces with cold, ordinary force. Rowan laughed once, breathless and shaky, and nobody mocked him for it. Corvin sat down on the nearest stone marker. Maris pressed both palms against her eyes. Alias walked several steps away from the entrance before stopping. His legs did not trust him yet. Eldric came to stand beside him. For once, he did not offer a riddle.

'Was it real?' Alias asked.

'The face?'

Alias nodded.

Eldric looked toward the pillar. Clouds dragged across its upper reaches, hiding and revealing stone in slow turns. 'Perhaps. Perhaps not. The Anchor is dangerous because it does not always lie. Sometimes it gives just enough truth to make stopping feel wise.'

Alias closed his eyes. The almost-face remained behind them, already fading. He wanted to be angry at Eldric for saving him, at Rowan for interrupting, at the Structure for offering and taking away. Instead he felt tired, and beneath the tiredness, afraid of what he might have chosen if they had not been there.

Trust companions before certainty, the keeper's message had said.

For the first time, Alias understood that the sentence had not been advice. It had been a survival instruction.

Chapter 16: The Lesson of Doubt

They camped far from the Anchor that night. Corvin insisted they continue walking until the pillar was no longer visible even from the highest rise, and nobody argued. The land softened slowly as they descended from the plateau. Grass returned first, then shrubs, then trees standing thin and wind-bent along the lower slopes. By the time they stopped near a narrow stream, the world had regained enough ordinary detail that Alias almost trusted it again.

Almost.

The camp came together in uneasy silence. Corvin set the perimeter with more care than usual. Maris unpacked her notes, stared at them, and put half away again. Rowan gathered firewood with frantic efficiency, returning with enough branches to survive a winter siege. Eldric brewed tea strong enough to qualify as medicine.

Alias tried to help with three separate tasks and failed at all of them because his mind remained in the chamber, kneeling over warm stone while a face almost became whole.

Dinner was simple: hard bread softened in broth, dried vegetables, a little salted meat Corvin had been saving for what he called morale purposes. Nobody joked about the flavor. That alone proved how shaken they were.

Rowan apologized first. He did it badly, which made it better somehow. He sat across from Corvin, turned a stick in his hands until it snapped, and said, 'I did not mean what I said in there. About you being scared to act.'

Corvin looked at the fire. 'You meant it at the time.'

'Yes. But I was wrong at the time.'

'That is an important distinction.'

'I am discovering many of those today.'

Corvin's mouth twitched. Not quite a smile, but enough.

'Apology accepted.'

Maris apologized next, though hers became an analysis halfway through because she was Maris. She admitted she had dismissed Corvin's measurements not because they were useless, but because the chamber had made her feel that interpretation was the only worthy path. Corvin admitted that he had clung to measurement because numbers felt safer than meaning.

Rowan admitted he still thought action mattered, but perhaps not all action needed to happen immediately, loudly, and in the most dangerous available direction.

'Growth,' Eldric said, pouring tea.

'Do not sound so proud,' Corvin replied.

'I am not proud. Merely entertained.'

The laughter came cautiously, then more fully. It did not erase what had happened, but it loosened the knot around it. Alias remained quiet through most of the apologies. He knew he owed his own, but the words sat heavy in his mouth. Finally he looked at the others and said, 'I thought I needed the answer more than I needed you.'

The fire cracked sharply, sending sparks into the dark.

No one interrupted.

Alias forced himself to continue. 'In the chamber. For a moment. I thought if I could just know, then everything else would be worth it. Even if I had to stop listening. Even if I had to...' He stopped there because finishing the sentence would make it too real. He looked down at his hands. 'I am sorry.'

Rowan leaned forward, elbows on knees. 'Did you see something?'

Alias nodded. 'Almost.'

Maris's expression softened. Corvin looked away, giving him privacy without leaving. Eldric watched the fire. Alias described the memory in careful pieces: smoke, the door, the woman's hand, the almost-face. He did not make it dramatic.

It already hurt enough. When he finished, nobody tried to explain it to him, which was the kindest thing they could have done.

'Not knowing is awful,' Rowan said quietly.

Alias laughed once, weakly. 'That is your scholarly conclusion?'

'Yes. I stand by it.'

'It is accurate,' Maris said.

Corvin picked up a small stone and turned it between his fingers. 'Not knowing can keep a person moving. A wrong answer can send them off a cliff.'

Everyone looked at him.

He frowned. 'What?'

'That was almost poetic,' Rowan said.

'Take it back,' Corvin replied.

The laughter came easier that time. Later, after the others settled, Alias remained by the fire with his notebook open. He wrote the events of the Anchor as honestly as he could, including the ugly parts. Especially the ugly parts. A record that removed shame became a lie with better handwriting. He wrote what Eldric had said about anchors, what Corvin had said about wrong answers, what Rowan had said about not knowing being awful. Then he wrote a line of his own:

Questions are roads too.

He underlined it twice. After a moment, he underlined it a third time.

The coin lay beside the notebook. It did not glow. It did not pulse. It offered no approval. Alias found he no longer wanted it to. The day had already given him enough certainty to last a lifetime.

Near midnight Eldric sat beside him. For a while they shared the silence. Alias had learned that Eldric's silences were not empty; they were rooms where thoughts could set themselves down without being chased.

'Did you ever enter the Anchor before?' Alias asked.

'No.'

'But you knew what it did.'

'A little.'

Alias groaned. Eldric smiled. 'I knew enough to be afraid of anyone who wanted certainty too badly.'

'That includes me.'

'It includes most people.'

The answer did not absolve him, but it made the shame less lonely. Alias closed the notebook and looked toward the dark hills where the Anchor stood beyond sight. He had not received the answer he wanted. He had received something less satisfying and more useful: a reason to keep walking without letting the need for answers devour everything else.

In the morning, when the group packed camp, they moved more carefully around one another. Not fragile. Not broken. Simply aware. The road ahead remained uncertain. That no longer felt entirely like failure.

Chapter 17: A Name in the Journal

Several weeks passed before the next true sign appeared. In that time the journey became less a series of discoveries and more a life. They woke, walked, argued, ate, repaired boots, copied inscriptions, avoided bad weather when possible and endured it when not. Corvin taught Rowan how to read survey marks. Rowan used this knowledge primarily to leave insulting but technically accurate notes beside poorly maintained roads.

Maris began organizing the group's findings into categories so precise that Alias suspected the categories themselves would one day require a guide. Eldric continued teaching small practical spells in the evenings: how to dry socks without burning them, how to warm tea without boiling it, how to mend a torn page if one had patience and respect for fibers.

Alias proved better at the page-mending than the tea-warming. His first attempt at warming tea created a smell Corvin described as 'aggressively brown.' Eldric insisted this was progress because nothing had exploded. Rowan asked whether exploding tea was possible. Eldric refused to answer, which everyone agreed meant yes.

The road led them through old farming villages, abandoned toll stations, and a town where the innkeeper charged extra for beds that did not contain spiders. Alias wrote everything down. Not only the mysteries. The ordinary things too. A child missing two front teeth who asked whether wolffolk could hear secrets through walls. A baker who gave Maris a free pastry because she corrected the spelling on his sign.

A stone bridge with one arch newer than the others. Rowan losing a boot in mud and accusing the road of theft. Corvin laughing before he could stop himself. These things mattered, though Alias could not have explained why without sounding sentimental. He wrote them anyway.

The ruined shrine appeared at the edge of a road that no longer led anywhere important. They might have missed it entirely if Rowan had not followed a bird into the trees. He claimed the bird was behaving suspiciously. Corvin said all birds behaved suspiciously if watched by Rowan. The bird escaped judgment, but Rowan returned shouting that he had found 'a collapsed little mystery with excellent moss.'

The shrine had once been a square building of pale stone. Time had collapsed most of the roof and given the rest to ivy. Roots pushed through the floor. A tree grew where an altar might have stood, its trunk twisting upward through broken beams. No symbols marked the entrance. No coin reaction guided them in. It felt ordinary in the way forgotten places often did, which made Alias cautious. Ordinary forgotten places had a habit of hiding the sharpest things.

Maris found the compartment beneath a cracked floor stone.

Corvin helped lift it after determining the surrounding structure was unlikely to collapse immediately, which everyone agreed was better than likely. Inside lay a small bundle wrapped in oilcloth. The cloth had decayed at the edges, but the journal within remained mostly intact. Its cover was dark green leather, stiff with age, and the pages smelled faintly of smoke.

They carried it outside where the light was better. Maris insisted on opening it first because old bindings required care. Rowan insisted on standing nearby in case it contained a curse. Corvin asked what, precisely, Rowan intended to do against a curse. Rowan admitted he had not planned that far. Eldric smiled into his tea, which he had somehow prepared despite the absence of a visible fire.

Most of the journal described travel along roads that no longer matched Corvin's maps. The writer had been practical, perhaps a courier or surveyor, recording distances, weather, damaged bridges, unfriendly dogs, and the cost of bread in various towns. Alias enjoyed the entries immediately. There was comfort in ordinary records. Proof that people had worried about meals and mud long before him.

Then he turned a page and stopped.

In the upper corner, drawn carefully in faded ink, was the symbol from the coin. The same curved line intersecting three smaller marks. The same shape carved into the wagon's hidden panels. The same mark that seemed to appear wherever the road became too strange to dismiss. Beneath it, written in a hand different from the rest of the journal, stood two words.

Varux Hyborea.

Alias stared at the name until the letters seemed to loosen from the page. They meant nothing to him. They should have meant nothing. He had never heard them spoken, never copied them from the archive, never seen them in any map or record. Yet the shape of the words felt comfortable in his mind, like a coat he had not worn yet but somehow knew would fit.

'Alias?' Maris asked.

He realized he had stopped breathing properly. 'I am fine.'

Corvin looked unconvinced. 'That is rarely true when someone says it that quickly.'

'Do you recognize the name?' Eldric asked.

Alias looked at him sharply. Eldric's expression gave away nothing, which in Eldric's case meant either he knew too much or nothing at all. Both possibilities were irritating. 'No,' Alias said. Then, because the word tasted incomplete, he added, 'I don't think so.'

Maris leaned closer but did not touch the page. 'The ink is newer than the surrounding entries. Not recent, but later. Someone added this.'

'Why?' Rowan asked.

'That is the question,' Corvin said.

'There are too many questions.'

'Welcome to the expedition.'

They searched the rest of the journal. No explanation appeared. No other mention of Varux Hyborea. Only the name, the symbol, and a faint stain across the lower edge of the page that might have been water or might have been something darker. Alias copied it carefully into his notebook. He told himself he did so because all evidence mattered. That was true. It was not the whole truth.

That evening he found himself writing the name in the margin of three separate pages. Varux Hyborea. Varux Hyborea. Varux Hyborea. Each time the letters came easier.

Too easy. The coin remained silent, but silence no longer reassured him. He tried sketching the face he had seen in the rainwater near the first wrong turn: hooded, almost human, older than he was. The drawing refused to become accurate.

Still, when he placed the name beneath it, something in the page settled.

Rowan noticed. Rowan noticed more than people gave him credit for, usually because they were distracted by whatever noise he was making at the time. He sat beside Alias without asking and looked at the sketch. For once, he did not make a joke immediately.

'He looks lonely,' Rowan said.

Alias considered denying that too. Instead he closed the notebook halfway. 'He is not real.'

'Not yet?'

The question landed too close to the truth. Alias looked toward the fire where Maris and Corvin were arguing softly over whether the shrine had been built before or after the road. Eldric sat nearby, listening to both and correcting neither. These people knew his face. His real one. His ears, his habits, his hunger for answers, his tendency to write insults in margins. The idea of another face should have felt like a lie.

Instead it felt like a door.

'I don't know,' he said.

Rowan nodded as though that answer was enough. 'Well, if you become mysterious and dramatic, try not to become boring. That would be unforgivable.'

Alias laughed, and some of the fear loosened. Not gone. Loosened. Rowan stood and wandered back toward the fire, where he immediately inserted himself into the road-shrine debate with an opinion based on bird behavior. Corvin closed his eyes. Maris looked ready to bite someone. Eldric finally laughed.

Alias opened the notebook again. Beneath the repeated name, he wrote: A name can be a mask before it is a person. Then he stared at the sentence until the fire burned low. He did not yet understand that years later he would wear that mask because he believed it could keep him safe. He did not yet know how many roads Varux Hyborea would walk.

He only knew that the name had entered the record, and once something entered the record, it became much harder to pretend it had never been found.

Part IV: The Name That Remained

Chapter 18: The Road East

The morning after the discovery of the journal arrived under a pale sky that made the whole road feel unfinished. Thin clouds softened the light. The ruined shrine disappeared behind the trees as the group continued east, but Alias found himself glancing back until the last broken stones vanished from sight. It was not fear that kept pulling his attention behind him, nor even curiosity in the usual sense.

It was the uncomfortable feeling that the shrine had not been a place they had found, but a place that had been waiting to place something in his hands.

The name remained at the center of everything. Varux Hyborea. He had written it several times before sleeping and had found himself tracing the letters again that morning along the edge of his notebook while Corvin discussed distances and Rowan attempted to convince everyone that breakfast tasted better if eaten while walking. The familiarity bothered Alias more than the mystery. A stranger's name should have stayed strange. This one did not.

It felt like standing outside a locked room and hearing movement on the other side of the door.

For most of the day the road gave them little to discuss. Fields gave way to forests, and forests opened into rocky hills where the wind moved low through the grass. The villages grew smaller as they traveled, then vanished altogether. By midday they stopped beside a stream narrow enough to step across and clear enough to see small fish holding themselves still against the current.

Rowan declared the place suitable for civilization and immediately lay down on the grass. Corvin inspected the ground and pointed out three reasons it was not suitable for civilization. Maris ignored both of them and unpacked her notes.

Alias sat beneath a leaning tree with his notebook open across one knee. He meant to record the morning's route. Instead he wrote the name again before realizing what his hand had done. Maris saw it before he could cover the page. She had the particular expression scholars wore when they had discovered a pattern and were trying very hard not to look triumphant about it. 'You're doing it again,' she said.

Alias looked up. 'Doing what?'

'Thinking yourself in circles.' Rowan rolled onto one elbow.

'The puzzle is winning.' Corvin, who had been refilling a water flask, added, 'Annoyingly, that is accurate.'

Alias closed the notebook halfway, though not quickly enough to hide the page. 'It's only a name.' Maris's gaze softened. 'Names are rarely only names in stories like this.'

'That is exactly the kind of sentence I would prefer not to hear while carrying a mysterious coin.' Rowan sat up. 'I liked it.' 'You would,' Corvin said. The argument that followed was mild and familiar, which made it easier for Alias to breathe.

The road had become full of ancient symbols, impossible archives, and Structures that taught by unsettling everyone involved. Ordinary bickering was suddenly precious.

That evening they camped in the shelter of three large stones that broke the wind. The fire struggled at first, then caught, throwing orange light across packs, faces, and the pages spread open before Maris. Alias noticed the coin warming in his pocket whenever he turned east. Not much. Not enough to alarm the others. Just enough to remind him that the name in the journal and the road ahead were connected.

He wrote that down carefully, then crossed out connected and replaced it with possibly connected. Corvin would have approved of the correction.

Sleep did not come easily. Long after the others had settled into their bedrolls, Alias remained awake beneath the stars.

The road behind him held Maanhaven, the wagon, the Reflection, the Archive, the Anchor, and the ruined shrine.

The road ahead held a name he did not understand.

Somewhere between those two directions, he suspected, waited a version of himself he had not yet met. The thought made him cold despite the fire. When he finally slept, his hand rested over the pocket where the coin lay warm against his side.

Chapter 19: Dreams of Another Life

The first dream came that night. Alias stood upon a balcony carved from white stone, high above a city he had never seen and somehow missed. Silver rivers cut through the streets below, reflecting lanterns that drifted through the night air like captive stars. Bridges arched between towers too slender to stand by ordinary rules. Music rose from somewhere far below, not loud enough to identify, but familiar enough that his chest tightened with homesickness.

He knew where the nearest stairway led. He knew the smell of the night markets hidden beneath the eastern arches. He knew the city, and knowing it terrified him.

He woke before dawn with his heart beating hard enough to make the world feel fragile. The camp remained quiet. Rowan had rolled halfway out of his blanket. Corvin slept as if discipline applied even to breathing. Maris had fallen asleep with one hand still resting on a closed notebook. Eldric sat awake beside the ashes of the fire, because Eldric was apparently immune to the basic requirements of ordinary life. Alias did not speak.

Eldric glanced at him once, long enough to show that he had noticed, then returned his gaze to the dark between the trees.

By morning the dream had lost its edges but not its weight.

Alias tried to record it after breakfast and found that his pencil hesitated over the page. Writing made things real. That was the entire purpose of writing, and sometimes its danger. He drew the balcony instead of describing the city. The lines came easily, too easily, and when Maris passed behind him she stopped so abruptly that Rowan nearly walked into her.

'Where did you see that?' she asked. Alias looked at the sketch and felt the locked-room sensation return. 'In a dream.'

Maris did not dismiss him. None of them did anymore. That might have been comforting if it had not also been proof that impossible things had become part of their working expectations. Corvin asked practical questions: whether the city had landmarks, whether Alias had seen signs, whether the dream had included a road. Rowan asked whether the city had good food. Eldric asked nothing, which told Alias more than he wanted. Silence, from Eldric, was rarely empty.

The second dream came two nights later. This time Alias stood in a library so vast that its upper shelves vanished into darkness. The air smelled of dust, ink, and old stone. Lamps burned with blue-white flames along the aisles, though no hands had lit them. He walked without knowing why, passing tables covered in open books and maps of places that changed whenever he looked away. Footsteps echoed somewhere ahead. Slow. Patient. Waiting for him to follow.

At the end of the aisle stood a figure dressed in dark traveling clothes. Human, or close enough to pass for one in poor light. The face remained hidden beneath the shadow of a hood, but Alias knew the name before it was spoken. The figure turned slightly, and the voice that emerged was calm, familiar, and impossibly tired. 'You're late.'

Alias woke sitting upright beside the dying fire. Rowan, startled by the movement, flailed inside his blanket and nearly rolled into Corvin's pack. 'Attack?' Rowan whispered, already reaching for a knife. Corvin opened one eye. 'If we are being attacked by sleep, you are losing.' Maris sat up next, hair loose around her face, and looked at Alias with immediate concern. 'Dream?' she asked. He nodded. The simple honesty of that nod felt like stepping onto unsafe ground.

He told them enough to be useful and not enough to feel exposed. The white city. The library. The figure. The words. He did not tell them about the homesickness. He did not tell them that the voice had sounded almost like his own if his own voice had grown older, smoother, and better practiced at hiding pain. Eldric listened without interruption.

When Alias finished, the older traveler poured the last of the hot water over tea leaves that had already served once and said, 'Some dreams are only dreams. Some are memories wearing masks. The difficulty lies in telling which kind has found you.'

Nobody found that comforting. The road continued after dawn, but the mood had changed. Alias felt watched by his own thoughts. Every reflective surface became suspect: water in hoofprints, polished buckles, the face of Corvin's compass, even the dark shine of tea in a cup. Varux Hyborea no longer felt like a name written by someone else. It felt like a door beginning to open from the other side.

Chapter 20: Hollow Creek

Hollow Creek appeared near the end of a long wet afternoon, when everyone had begun to believe that civilization was a rumor invented to motivate tired feet. The village sat in a narrow valley where a clear stream curved around stone houses and vanished beneath a wooden bridge. Smoke rose from chimneys. Chickens wandered freely through the road with the confidence of creatures that had never encountered consequences.

Compared to Maanhaven, the place seemed impossibly small. Compared to the road, it looked like luxury.

The inn had six rooms, one common hall, and a sign painted with a trout so badly proportioned that Rowan stopped outside to admire it. 'That fish knows secrets,' he said. Corvin replied that the fish knew poor anatomy. Maris said both observations could be true. Alias would have written the exchange down if his hands had not been too cold to cooperate.

Instead he followed the smell of bread, stew, and wood smoke inside, where warmth gathered beneath low beams and every conversation paused just long enough to measure the strangers at the door.

Small places did not keep curiosity hidden. By the time bowls had been placed before them, half the room had discovered they were travelers from the west. By the time the stew cooled enough to eat without injury, the other half had learned there was a scholar among them, a surveyor, an old traveler, a reckless man with too much energy, and a wolffolk who wrote everything down. Alias noticed the order in which those descriptions traveled.

He also noticed that nobody mentioned the coin. That was because he had not shown it. For once, wisdom had arrived before curiosity.

The old rabbitfolk approached their table near midnight, after the room had thinned and the fire had settled into red coals. He moved slowly with the help of a polished walking stick, but his eyes remained sharp enough to make Alias sit straighter before a word was spoken. The old man did not introduce himself. He simply looked at Alias's pocket as though he could see through cloth and said, 'You carry an old symbol.'

The table went quiet. Rowan's hand stopped halfway to his cup. Corvin's expression became very still. Maris reached for her notebook by instinct, then stopped herself, which meant the moment had become serious enough to overcome scholarship. Alias considered lying. The thought lasted less than a heartbeat. Slowly, he removed the coin and placed it on the table where the firelight could reach it.

The old rabbitfolk lowered himself into the empty chair with a soft breath. He did not touch the coin. He only looked at it, and the years in his face seemed to gather around his eyes. 'I knew someone who carried that mark,' he said. Nobody interrupted him. Even the innkeeper, pretending to wipe down the counter, had gone motionless. 'Human fellow. Quiet. Always writing in little books.'

Asked about roads that no one used anymore and ruins that sensible people left alone. Stayed here many years ago, though not long enough for anyone to know him well.'

Alias felt the room narrow around him. 'What was his name?' The old man looked from the coin to Alias, and for a moment something like pity crossed his face. 'Varux,' he said. 'Varux Hyborea.'

The name did not strike like thunder. It sank, which was worse. Thunder startled and vanished. This settled into Alias slowly, filling places he had not known were hollow. Rowan whispered something that might have been a curse. Maris finally opened her notebook. Corvin asked the old man when this Varux had passed through, what direction he had traveled, whether he carried companions, what he had purchased, whom he had spoken to. Practical questions.

Useful questions. Alias heard them as though from underwater.

The old rabbitfolk remembered fragments. Varux had traveled north after asking about a place in the hills where stars could be seen even during storms. He had paid for his room in old coin but not the coin, never that coin. He had repaired a child's broken toy with a small spell and refused payment beyond a cup of tea. He had copied something from the village records before leaving at dawn. The details were ordinary, almost painfully so. That made them harder to dismiss.

When the old man finally left the table, the group remained silent for several breaths. The common hall returned slowly to its own life, but their corner of it did not. Alias stared at the coin until the markings blurred. Varux had been here. Not as a dream, not as a name in a ruined journal, but as a person who slept under a roof, drank tea, repaired toys, and asked questions. The mystery had put on boots and walked through a village. That made it feel closer than any Structure had.

Chapter 21: The Silent Observatory

They left Hollow Creek with directions drawn on the back of an old grain receipt because the village possessed no proper map of the northern hills. Corvin objected to this on principle.

Rowan declared the receipt adventurous. Maris copied it twice and labeled both copies unreliable but valuable. Alias kept the original folded inside his notebook beside the page where he had written Varux Hyborea too many times to pretend indifference.

The path north climbed steadily for four days. The air sharpened as the hills rose beneath them. Trees thinned. Grass gave way to stone. At night the stars seemed closer, bright enough to make the darkness feel less empty. Alias dreamed each night, though not always clearly. A white balcony. A library aisle. A hand turning a page. A voice saying words he could not remember upon waking.

Each morning he wrote what remained, and each morning the fragments looked less like dreams and more like pieces of a record damaged by water.

The Silent Observatory appeared just after sunrise on the fourth day. At first it looked like a pale line drawn across the ridge. Then the road curved, the sun lifted, and the Structure revealed itself in full: white stone towers arranged around a central dome, terraces open to the sky, bronze instruments fixed toward horizons and heavens.

The place reflected light so intensely that Rowan raised a hand against the glare and muttered that any building that bright was trying too hard.

No birds circled the towers. No animals moved among the stones. Even the wind seemed to lower its voice upon reaching the ridge. The silence did not feel empty. It felt instructed. Corvin noticed the lack of sound first and stopped at the outer steps. 'I dislike this,' he said. Rowan, who had been about to make a joke, closed his mouth. Maris looked delighted and terrified in equal measure. Eldric simply removed his hat, as though entering a place where noise would be rude.

Inside, the Observatory opened into a circular hall lined with star charts carved directly into the walls. Some constellations Alias recognized. Most he did not. Bronze rings hung from the ceiling, suspended by chains so thin they seemed incapable of holding their own weight. At the center stood a stone table covered with markings that shifted subtly as sunlight moved through openings in the dome above. Maris approached it with the reverence of someone entering a temple built by librarians.

The first hours vanished into study. Corvin measured angles between windows and horizon markers. Maris translated labels from three languages and two systems of notation that, according to her, should not have existed in the same century.

Rowan found a lever and, after a long stare from Corvin, chose personal growth over immediate satisfaction by not pulling it.

Eldric wandered the outer ring of the hall, pausing occasionally before inscriptions too worn for anyone else to read.

Alias found the journal in a small chamber facing east. The room contained a narrow desk, a stool, a cracked inkstone, and a window positioned so that dawn light fell across the writing surface. Dust covered most of the room. Not the desk. Someone had cleaned it within the last few years, perhaps more than once. The journal rested at the center as though placed for discovery rather than forgotten.

He knew before opening it. That made the act harder. His fingers hesitated against the cover. Leather, dark blue, worn at the corners. Practical stitching. A small mark burned into the lower right corner: the same symbol carried by the coin. Maris entered behind him and stopped in the doorway. She did not ask whether he needed help. Corvin and Rowan arrived a moment later, then Eldric, who looked at the journal and sighed so softly Alias almost missed it.

The final entry had been written only a few years earlier. The handwriting was steady, compact, and familiar in a way that made Alias's stomach turn. Observations of the Observatory filled the page: star positions, seasonal alignments, references to a future return. At the bottom, beneath a line drawn with deliberate care, stood the signature. Varux Hyborea.

For a long time no one spoke. The silence of the Observatory gathered around them until even breathing seemed too loud.

Alias touched the name once, lightly, as though ink might answer if treated gently. It did not. The mystery had ceased being history. Someone bearing that name had stood in that room, watched the dawn through that window, and written with a hand that moved like a shadow of Alias's own.

Chapter 22: The Name That Remained

They made camp beneath the ridge because nobody wished to sleep inside the Observatory. This was not discussed at length. Some decisions required no debate. The Structure remained above them in the moonlight, white towers pale against a sky crowded with stars. From below, it looked less like a building than a thought the mountain had refused to forget.

Maris worked beside the fire with the journal open on a cloth to protect its pages. She handled it with a tenderness that made Rowan whisper an apology after accidentally dropping a stick too close to it. Corvin sat opposite her, recording practical details: age of ink, condition of binding, likely travel routes from Hollow Creek, possible dates. Eldric watched the flames. Alias watched the journal and tried not to feel as though it was watching back.

The entries were not dramatic. That made them worse. Varux had written about weather, angles, road conditions, local stories, the behavior of the Observatory during moonrise. He noted when ink froze in cold air. He complained about poor tea in one village and praised the bread in Hollow Creek. He recorded a child's broken toy repaired with a small hinge charm. Ordinary things. Living things.

The kind of details Alias himself would have preserved because the world was built from them as much as from ruins and revelations.

Near dawn, after most of the fire had collapsed into coals, Alias finally took the journal into his own hands. The others allowed it without comment. He turned pages slowly. The handwriting did not match his exactly, but it shared habits he recognized: weather placed near the top of entries, small sketches in margins, questions bracketed instead of underlined, corrections made carefully rather than scratched out.

He found himself following the rhythm too easily. It was like hearing a song in another room and knowing where the next note would fall.

Halfway through the journal, a folded paper slipped loose and landed against his knee. Alias stared at it until Rowan, who had been pretending not to watch, whispered, 'That's usually important.' Nobody laughed. Alias unfolded the paper with care. It held only one sentence at first glance, written in the same steady hand as the journal: If you are reading this, then you are closer than I was.

Beneath the sentence stood the symbol from the coin. Beneath the symbol, lower on the page, waited one final line. We have met before.

The words changed the air around the fire. Corvin leaned forward. Maris stopped breathing for a moment, then forced herself to inhale. Rowan looked from the note to Alias and back again. Eldric closed his eyes as if some old suspicion had finally stepped into the open.

Alias read the line again. We have met before. It should have been impossible. He had never met Varux Hyborea. He would have remembered a person whose name followed him through dreams, journals, village stories, and impossible Structures. Unless memory was precisely the problem. Unless remembering was not the same as knowing. Unless the locked room in his mind had more doors than he had understood.

Fear arrived quietly. Not fear of danger, though danger might come. Not fear of death, though the road had never promised safety. This was a stranger fear: the possibility that the answers he sought were already waiting somewhere ahead, and that those answers might know him more completely than he knew himself.

Alias folded the note again, then unfolded it immediately because hiding the words did not make them less real. The coin in his pocket had gone warm. Above them, the Silent Observatory watched the stars without sound. Beyond the ridge, the road continued into darkness.

Somewhere out there lay the next Structure, the next clue, perhaps even Varux himself if names could haunt the living.

Alias opened his notebook with hands that were steadier than he felt and copied the message exactly.

When he finished, he did not write a theory beneath it. He did not write a joke. He did not write a question. For the first time in a long while, the page remained silent after the record. The name Varux Hyborea no longer felt like a mystery found along the road. It felt like a shadow walking a few steps ahead, patient enough to wait for Alias to catch up.

Part V: The Echoes Of Varux

Chapter 23: The Journal Road

The observatory disappeared behind them beneath a sky of pale blue and drifting clouds. For the first few hours nobody spoke very much. Varux's journal rested inside Alias's pack, wrapped carefully in cloth as though it were something fragile enough to break from a careless touch. In a way, it was. The book contained more than notes.

It contained proof that Varux Hyborea had walked these roads not centuries ago, but recently enough that his footsteps still seemed to linger in the world.

Several times throughout the morning Alias caught himself reaching toward the journal without realizing it. He never removed it from his pack, but the temptation remained. The pages felt unfinished somehow, like a conversation interrupted halfway through. Every answer they discovered seemed to reveal another layer hidden beneath it.

By midday they stopped beside a stone bridge crossing a narrow river. Rowan immediately claimed the best spot in the shade, which led to a brief argument with Corvin about what qualified as a best spot. Maris ignored both of them and opened one of her notebooks. Eldric simply watched the water pass beneath the bridge. When he finally spoke, it was only to tell Alias that he looked tired.

'That's not what I meant,' Eldric said when Alias laughed it off.

The older traveler returned his gaze to the river. Alias knew better than to press him. Eldric had a habit of saying exactly enough and no more, which unfortunately left everyone else thinking about his words long after the conversation ended.

Chapter 24: Footsteps in Stone

The first location mentioned in the journal turned out to be an abandoned watch post built into the side of a cliff. Most of the structure had collapsed long ago, but fragments remained. A crumbling tower overlooked the valley below, and a narrow staircase still clung stubbornly to the rock.

According to Varux's notes, the place held no treasure, no forgotten Structure, and no secret waiting beneath the stones. He had come there for the view. Rowan considered this deeply suspicious. Maris considered it perfectly reasonable. Corvin refused to take sides, which somehow resulted in everyone arguing with him anyway.

While the others debated, Alias climbed the final section of the tower alone. Wind rushed across the valley. Villages appeared as tiny clusters of rooftops far below while roads wound through forests and hills like pale ribbons stretching toward the horizon.

Near the top he found something carved into the stone. Not a message. Not a warning. Only a symbol. The same symbol carried by the coin. The same symbol hidden throughout their journey. For reasons he could not explain, seeing it there filled him with relief. It meant Varux had truly stood in this place. He was no longer a story told through journals and rumors. He had become real.

Chapter 25: The Weight of Similarity

The realization arrived gradually. That made it harder to ignore.

At first it was small things. A phrase written in the margin of a journal entry. An observation about weather patterns. A complaint about poor road maintenance that sounded exactly like something Alias himself might have written. The more he read, the more familiar the voice became.

One evening he sat beside the fire reading aloud from a passage. Rowan listened for several minutes before frowning.

'Why does that sound like something you'd say?'

Alias opened his mouth to answer and stopped.

Because it did.

That was the problem.

It wasn't just one sentence anymore. It was dozens. Hundreds. The way Varux described places. The details he noticed. The questions he asked. Reading the journal felt increasingly like reading the work of someone who thought exactly the way Alias did.

Later that night, long after the others had fallen asleep, he stared into the campfire and wondered whether that frightened him because it seemed impossible, or because it seemed plausible.

Chapter 26: The Hall of Remembered Voices

The Structure appeared three days later at the end of a canyon hidden between steep walls of stone. They almost missed the entrance entirely. A narrow archway had been carved directly into the rock, weathered enough to resemble a natural formation from a distance.

Ancient letters stretched across the stone above it.

The Hall of Remembered Voices.

Inside, the air felt cool and strangely still. Long corridors extended into darkness. Every footstep echoed softly against polished walls. The deeper they traveled, the more the silence seemed to listen.

Then came the whispers.

At first they were faint enough to dismiss as imagination. Then they became clearer. Voices. Different voices. Familiar voices.

Alias stopped walking.

For a brief moment he heard laughter. Warm. Distant. Familiar enough to make his chest tighten. A woman's voice followed. Then another. Fragments of conversation drifted through the darkness before fading again. He knew those voices. Or thought he did. The certainty vanished the moment he tried to grasp it.

Beside him Maris had gone pale. Rowan stared into the corridor ahead. Even Corvin looked unsettled. Whatever the Structure preserved, it was not simply sound. It preserved memory.

Chapter 27: The Echoes of Varux

They reached the center of the Hall near sunset. A circular chamber waited beyond the final corridor. Thousands of names had been carved into the surrounding walls. At the center stood a single stone pedestal.

Upon it rested a journal.

Not Varux's journal.

Another one.

Newer.

Alias approached slowly. The cover opened beneath his fingers. The first page contained a date only a few months old. The second page described the Hall itself. The third page made his heart stop.

If you have reached this place, then the echoes have already begun.

The handwriting matched Varux's.

Below the sentence another line had been added.

You have heard voices that feel familiar. Do not trust certainty. Memory is not always the same thing as truth.

The chamber seemed impossibly quiet. Alias turned the page. The next entry contained descriptions of the group. Not travelers in general. His group.

Rowan.

Maris.

Corvin.

Eldric.

And finally Alias.

The entry ended with a single sentence.

He still asks the same questions.

No signature followed. None was needed. Everyone already knew who had written it.

Far above them, somewhere within the darkness of the Hall, a distant voice echoed once before fading away. It sounded almost like laughter.

Part VI: The City Of Glass

Chapter 28: Beyond the Hall

The Hall of Remembered Voices did not release them all at once. Even after the canyon walls had fallen behind and the road opened across a plain of pale grass, the place remained with them in small, uncomfortable ways. Alias heard the echo of a woman's laugh whenever the wind moved through dry reeds. Maris kept turning her head, as though someone had spoken her name just behind her shoulder.

Rowan, who normally treated silence as a personal enemy, walked for nearly an hour without saying anything at all. Corvin noticed this, clearly considered commenting on it, and then made the wise choice not to.

Varux's second journal traveled in Alias's pack beside the first. He had wrapped both in cloth after leaving the Hall, partly to protect them and partly because touching the covers too often made the world feel unsteady. The newer book was worse. It had not been found in an old shrine or preserved in the careful stillness of the observatory. It had waited in a Structure that knew their voices before they arrived. It mentioned them by name.

It knew Rowan, Maris, Corvin, Eldric, and him. It knew that Alias still asked the same questions, and the sentence had lodged under his ribs like a thorn.

They stopped near evening on a ridge where the land opened westward into a sweep of plains. The sunset turned the grass copper and threw long shadows behind every stone. Corvin chose the campsite with more care than usual, checking the slope, the wind, the water source, and the direction of the nearest tree line. Rowan watched him for several minutes before asking whether the ground had passed inspection.

Corvin replied that the ground was adequate, which Rowan declared the most romantic thing anyone had ever said about dirt.

The joke helped more than anyone admitted. They unpacked slowly, and the familiar work of making camp gave shape to a day that had otherwise felt like walking out of a dream. Maris sorted the copied pages from the Hall and placed stones on the corners so the wind would not take them. Eldric brewed tea with the solemnity of a priest performing a rite.

Alias sat near the fire before it was fully lit, one hand resting on his pack where the journals lay hidden beneath his spare cloak.

'You should read it again,' Maris said at last. She did not look at him when she spoke, which made the suggestion gentler. 'Not alone this time. All of us. If Varux wrote about us, then it concerns all of us.' Alias wanted to argue. The instinct arrived quickly and foolishly, born from fear rather than reason. The journal felt personal because it named him.

But Maris was right. The mystery had stopped belonging to him the moment the others chose to walk the road beside him.

After dinner, when the sky had darkened and the fire had grown steady, Alias unwrapped the newer journal and opened it on his knees. The handwriting was the same as before: controlled, precise, practical, with occasional flourishes that seemed to appear only when the writer forgot to be careful. He read aloud the entry from the Hall. This time the words sounded different with everyone listening. Do not trust certainty.

Memory is not always the same thing as truth. Rowan leaned back with his arms folded, trying to appear casual and failing.

Corvin stared into the fire as if the flames might produce a diagram. Maris wrote nothing at all, which told Alias more than any question could have.

Eldric was the last to speak. 'Have you considered that Varux may not be leading us toward him?' he asked. Alias looked up.

'Then what is he doing?' The old traveler turned his cup slowly between both hands. 'Perhaps he is leading us toward whatever made him necessary.' Nobody answered. The fire cracked softly, sending sparks into the dark.

Far above, the first stars appeared. For the first time since Maanhaven, Alias found himself wishing Gerhardt were there to say something dry enough to make the fear less impressive.

Later, after the others had settled into uneasy sleep, Alias remained awake with the journal open and his notebook beside it. He copied one line from Varux, then wrote one of his own beneath it. The path ahead is made of things that refuse to stay hidden. He stared at the sentence until the ink dried. Then he added: I am beginning to wonder whether I am one of them.

Chapter 29: The Road of Mirrors

The road described in Varux's journal led east into a region almost completely absent from modern maps. Corvin disliked that immediately. A map, he explained on the second morning, did not need to know everything, but it should at least have the dignity to admit where it became useless. The parchment in his hands offered no such dignity.

Roads faded into faint lines, settlements became uncertain dots, and several stretches of land were represented by blank space, which Rowan insisted was cartographic honesty and Corvin called laziness.

The land itself changed slowly. Villages disappeared first. Then fences. Then the familiar stone markers that usually appeared beside old roads every few miles. In their place stood narrow pillars of pale rock, half-buried in grass and angled as though they had grown tired while standing. Each bore a single carved symbol.

At first the markings were too worn to identify. By the third pillar, Maris had already stopped the group twice to compare rubbings. By the fifth, none of them needed confirmation. The symbol matched the coin.

Alias tried to treat the discovery as information. That was safer than treating it as a message. Information could be copied, categorized, discussed, and stored between pages. Messages expected response. Unfortunately, the road did not care what he preferred.

The pillars appeared more frequently as they traveled, first every few miles, then every few hundred steps, then close enough that walking between them felt like passing through an unfinished corridor whose walls had been lost to time.

The first mirror appeared near noon. It was not glass, or at least not any glass Alias knew. A thin sheet of reflective stone protruded from the ground beside the road, no taller than his knee and half-covered in dust. Rowan saw it first and, for once, did not touch it. This remarkable act of restraint earned him a suspicious look from Corvin. Rowan spread his hands. 'I can learn.' Corvin said, 'Evidence remains limited.' Maris crouched beside the object and brushed away loose soil with the edge of her sleeve.

The surface reflected the sky perfectly. Not the group. Not the grass. Only the sky. Clouds moved across it in slow white shapes, though above them the day was clear. Eldric stepped closer without kneeling. His expression tightened in the way it did when he recognized a problem before anyone else had found its edges. 'It is remembering,' he said. Rowan looked at the mirror, then at the empty sky overhead. 'Remembering clouds?' Eldric smiled faintly. 'Perhaps a different day.'

By afternoon the mirrors had grown larger. Some stood upright like doorways without frames. Others lay flat in the grass, reflecting stars though the sun still shone. Passing them became increasingly uncomfortable. Alias caught glimpses in the corners of his eyes: his own face older than it should have been, his hair longer, his ears hidden beneath a hood, his tail absent, his posture changed in ways too small to name and too large to ignore. Whenever he turned directly toward the image, it became ordinary again.

He did not mention this at first. That decision lasted until Rowan stopped beside a pillar and said, very quietly, 'Does anyone else keep seeing things that are rude enough to vanish when looked at?' Maris exhaled with visible relief. Corvin closed his map. Eldric did not appear relieved at all, which was rarely a good sign.

They compared what they had seen while standing in the middle of the road, surrounded by mirrors that reflected wrong skies and almost-familiar versions of themselves. The accounts differed, but one fact remained constant: the mirrors were not showing the past only. Some images felt like memory. Others felt like warning.

When they made camp that night, nobody chose a place near the mirrors. Unfortunately, the mirrors had become difficult to avoid. A tall one stood beyond the firelight, angled toward the camp as though politely listening. Alias woke once near midnight and saw it reflecting the round table at The Wandering Lantern. Gerhardt stood behind the counter, polishing a mug.

For a moment Alias felt such a sudden ache for home that he almost called out. Then the reflection shifted, and another figure sat at the table with his back turned: human-shaped, dark-haired, writing in a notebook. By the time Alias reached the mirror, it reflected only stars.

Chapter 30: The City of Glass

They saw the city at sunrise on the fifth day. At first it looked like light caught in the valley. Then the sun climbed higher, and the shape of the place emerged from the morning haze: towers of crystal and pale stone, bridges suspended between impossible heights, domes that turned the sky into fragments, streets shining faintly beneath a layer of dew.

The entire city seemed less built than grown from reflection, as if someone had planted a piece of moonlight and waited centuries for it to become architecture.

Nobody spoke for a long while. Even Rowan, who had offered commentary on nearly every strange sight since Maanhaven, remained silent with his mouth slightly open. Corvin lowered his map as if personally offended that paper had failed to prepare him. Maris stood with both hands pressed over the strap of her satchel, eyes bright and unfocused, already somewhere between scholarship and worship. Eldric watched the city with a sadness Alias did not understand.

'That,' Rowan said at last, 'is not a normal ruin.' Corvin folded his map with unusual care. 'An extraordinary conclusion.'

Rowan ignored him. 'I mean it. Ruins fall apart. That looks like it has been waiting for someone to notice it.' Alias looked down into the valley and felt the coin warm against his side.

The reaction was gentle, almost welcoming, which made it worse. Places that wanted you afraid were honest. Places that welcomed you could be much more dangerous.

The road descended through terraces overgrown with pale grass. As they approached, the city changed with each step. Towers that had seemed solid from above turned translucent at certain angles. Bridges appeared where none had been and vanished when the group changed direction. The streets were empty, but not abandoned.

There was no dust gathered in doorways, no nests in broken windows, no weeds splitting stones. Everything looked untouched, preserved in the moment after departure, as though an entire population had stepped out briefly and meant to return before dinner.

At the first gate, if it could be called a gate, two curved pillars rose from the ground without meeting overhead. No wall connected them. No door barred passage. Yet when Rowan attempted to walk between them before anyone had finished examining the carvings, he stopped abruptly and stepped back. 'No,' he said. Corvin looked up. 'No what?' Rowan pointed between the pillars. 'No to whatever that felt like.'

This was sufficiently unlike him that nobody laughed.

Maris translated the inscription slowly. The writing shifted beneath her eyes, not changing language exactly, but offering meaning in layers. 'The City of Glass preserves what was seen, what may be seen, and what refuses to be seen,' she said. Then she frowned. 'That last part might also mean what hides from itself.' Alias did not like the way everyone avoided looking at him after that. He liked even less that he understood why.

They entered together. The moment they passed between the pillars, the city filled with sound. Not loud sound. Not voices exactly. The faint impression of footsteps on streets, distant doors closing, water moving through unseen channels, laughter from somewhere far away. The echoes vanished whenever anyone tried to focus on them. Every surface reflected the group: windows, walls, polished stones beneath their feet. At first the reflections obeyed. Then, slowly, they began to drift.

Alias saw his reflection turn its head before he did. Maris watched herself pause beside a window she had not yet reached. Corvin's reflection checked a map while Corvin's actual hands remained empty. Rowan waved at himself and became deeply offended when the reflection did not wave back until several seconds later. Eldric alone avoided the glass as much as possible.

When Alias asked why, the old traveler said, 'Some things become impolite if you stare too long.' Rowan whispered that this applied to Corvin as well. Corvin heard him. The argument that followed felt almost normal, and for that reason alone Alias was grateful.

Chapter 31: Reflections of Tomorrow

The deeper they traveled, the less the City of Glass resembled a city and the more it resembled an enormous question pretending to be one. Streets led to courtyards that reflected different skies. Staircases climbed into towers whose interiors seemed wider than their walls allowed. Rooms opened onto other rooms that could not have fit within the same building. Corvin took measurements until the numbers became openly insulting.

Maris filled three pages with notes before admitting that the city might not respect physical consistency enough for conventional mapping.

They found the first public square near midday. A dry fountain stood at its center, carved from transparent stone and filled not with water but with reflected movement. People crossed the surface in silence: figures in unfamiliar clothing, children chasing one another between market stalls, merchants arranging goods, a woman carrying a basket of blue flowers. The images repeated, overlapped, vanished, and returned from different angles.

They were not ghosts. Alias felt certain of that. Ghosts suggested the dead. These felt like moments, preserved because the city had once seen them and refused to forget.

Maris stood before the fountain for nearly half an hour. Her face softened in a way Alias rarely saw. 'All records choose what to preserve,' she said eventually. 'This place preserved everything it could see.' Corvin looked around at the empty square. 'Then where are the people?' The question settled over them. The city had preserved echoes, reflections, gestures, and light. It had not preserved bodies. It had not preserved answers.

In a hall beyond the square, the reflections became personal.

One wall showed Corvin standing years younger beside a collapsed bridge, jaw clenched, hands bleeding from lifting stones. Another showed Maris as a child crying over torn pages while an older scholar told her some knowledge was not worth saving. Rowan saw himself alone at a tavern table, smiling too broadly while nobody sat across from him. He stopped joking after that.

Eldric saw something in a narrow pane of blue glass and closed his eyes before anyone else could look.

Alias tried not to search for himself. That proved impossible.

His reflections waited in every polished surface. Some showed the traveler who had left Maanhaven: ears visible, cloak worn, notebook held too tightly. Others showed the face from the rainwater mirror: human-looking, hooded, older, eyes clearer and sadder than his own. In one reflection he had longer hair tied badly at the nape of his neck. In another his ears were hidden but not gone.

In another he wore a mask and smiled like someone who had practiced being unrecognizable until it became a skill.

The largest chamber stood at the heart of a tower that seemed to catch the sun from every direction. Its walls were made entirely of glass panels, each angled slightly differently.

The moment Alias stepped inside, every reflection turned toward him. Not toward the group. Toward him. The others stopped at the threshold. Rowan whispered something that might have been a curse. Maris said his name, but the room swallowed the sound.

Across the chamber, one reflection did not mimic him at all. A man stood on the other side of the glass: human, dark-haired, older than Alias but not old, wearing a travel coat marked with dust and repairs. His posture was familiar. That was the worst part. Not his face. Not his clothes. The way he stood, weight slightly shifted as though ready to leave at any moment, one hand near a pocket where a notebook might have been.

The man looked directly at Alias and smiled faintly, with an expression that carried apology before any words arrived.

'Varux,' Alias said. The name barely left his mouth. The figure raised a hand and placed it against the glass. Alias stepped forward before he could decide whether doing so was wise. His own hand rose. For one impossible heartbeat, their palms aligned on opposite sides of the surface. The glass was cold.

The figure's mouth moved, but no sound came through.

Then every panel in the chamber flashed white, and Varux vanished. Alias remained with his hand against the glass long after the room had returned to ordinary reflection. Behind him, Eldric murmured, 'Closer now.' Alias turned. 'To what?' Eldric looked at the empty panel. 'That is the question, isn't it?'

Chapter 32: A Message Across Time

They spent the rest of the day searching the tower. Nobody said they were searching for Varux, not at first, but every path they chose bent toward that purpose. Maris examined inscriptions until her eyes reddened. Corvin mapped each floor despite the building changing order twice when they turned around.

Rowan, uncharacteristically focused, tested doors, staircases, and mirrored panels with the solemn caution of someone who had finally decided the world might be dangerous in ways enthusiasm could not solve. Eldric stayed near Alias without making it obvious, which of course made it obvious.

Near evening they found the chamber beneath the tower. It lay below a spiral staircase that had not existed when they first passed that corridor. The steps descended into blue light. At the bottom waited a room of glass panels arranged in a circle, each one holding a different scene: the Hall of Remembered Voices, the Silent Observatory, the abandoned watch post, the ruined shrine, the round table inside The Wandering Lantern. The images were silent at first. Then one panel brightened as they approached.

It showed The Wandering Lantern at night. Rain moved against the windows. Gerhardt stood behind the counter, younger by only a little, polishing a mug with the same long-suffering expression he had worn when Alias first counted three copper at his table. At the round table sat Varux. He looked strange in that familiar place. Too composed. Too tired. Too much like a man visiting a memory that did not belong to him and yet hurt anyway.

The panel carried sound when Varux began to speak. 'If you have reached the City of Glass,' he said, 'then you have already discovered more than I expected. Or less. The city has a habit of showing people what they can survive seeing, which is not always the same as what they came to find.' His voice was lower than Alias expected. Calm, but worn at the edges. Rowan leaned closer despite himself. Corvin's expression hardened into concentration.

Maris had stopped breathing through her nose, which meant she was trying very hard not to cry or ask sixteen questions at once.

Varux glanced down at something on the table, perhaps notes, perhaps his own hands. 'There are mistakes ahead,' he continued. 'Some will be mine. Some may be yours. I would warn you away if warning had ever stopped anyone worth knowing. So instead I will say this: do not mistake resemblance for understanding. Do not mistake memory for truth. And do not mistake a mask for a lie simply because it hides a face.'

Alias felt the words settle inside him with uncomfortable precision. A mask. A lie. A face. The Reflection had told him one self, many faces. The Anchor had warned him against certainty. The Archive had taught him that questions could be preserved without being solved. Now Varux, from some recorded moment that felt far too aware of them, was speaking as though he had read every page of Alias's unwritten future.

The image shifted. Varux looked directly outward, and for the first time his composure cracked. Not much. Just enough.

'And Alias,' he said softly, 'if you are there, stop blaming yourself for things you do not remember.' The chamber went utterly still. Alias could feel the others looking at him and hated that he had no defense against their concern. Varux's hand moved toward something beyond the edge of the panel. When he spoke again, his voice had changed. 'If you continue east, the city will show you the door. Do not open it unless you are prepared to lose the road behind you.'

The panel dimmed before anyone could respond, as if response had ever been possible. For a while nobody moved. Then Rowan whispered, 'I hate him a little.' Maris wiped at one eye with the back of her hand and pretended not to. Corvin folded his map very carefully even though he had not been holding it open. Eldric watched Alias, but this time there was no teasing wisdom in his expression, only quiet understanding.

Alias stood before the darkened panel long after the others had begun speaking in low voices around him. The city reflected him from every wall. In one pane he looked like himself. In another, older. In another, human-faced and hooded. In another, the reflection had turned away entirely. He reached into his pocket and closed his fingers around the coin. It was warm. Not warning him. Not guiding him. Reminding him.

Somewhere beyond the City of Glass waited the door Varux had mentioned. Somewhere beyond that waited a road he might not be able to walk back from. And for the first time, Alias was afraid not because the mystery was far away, but because it was beginning to sound like his own voice.

Part VII: The Divided Path

Chapter 33: The Road That Split

The road east of the City of Glass was unlike any they had traveled before. It began as a single stone road cutting through rolling grasslands, but within days it fractured into countless branches. Some roads curved north. Others vanished into forests. A few seemed to circle back upon themselves entirely. Ancient markers stood at every junction, each carved with symbols so worn by time that they could no longer be read.

The uncertainty irritated Corvin more than anyone else. Maps were useful because roads were supposed to lead somewhere. These roads seemed to have abandoned that agreement entirely. Several evenings were spent debating routes beside campfires while Rowan suggested increasingly ridiculous methods of navigation.

'We could follow whichever road looks most dramatic,' Rowan suggested.

'That's not a real method,' Corvin replied.

'It has worked surprisingly often.'

'That is deeply concerning.'

The argument continued long enough that even Maris began laughing. For a brief time, the weight of Varux and the Structures felt distant. Yet Alias noticed something else. Each road seemed to awaken a different feeling inside him. One inspired curiosity. Another unease. A third felt strangely familiar.

He did not tell the others that.

Chapter 34: Cracks in the Group

The first serious disagreement began three days later.

Maris wanted to follow clues hidden within Varux's journals.

Corvin wanted to pursue the most logical route toward the next known Structure. Rowan argued that both plans sounded boring and proposed investigating a ruin visible on a distant hill.

Nobody supported Rowan's plan.

He remained offended by this.

The debate lasted most of the afternoon. What would once have been a friendly discussion slowly became something heavier. Everyone was tired. Everyone carried questions without answers. Every discovery seemed to create new mysteries rather than solve old ones.

By sunset the frustration was visible.

Alias found himself standing apart from the others while they argued quietly around the fire. The journals rested on his lap.

For the first time since leaving Maanhaven, he wondered whether the journey was beginning to pull them apart.

The thought frightened him more than any Structure ever had.

Chapter 35: The Traveler at the Crossroads

They met the traveler shortly before dawn.

He stood beside an ancient crossroads where seven roads converged beneath a circle of weathered stones. A gray cloak hid most of his features. He carried no visible weapon and seemed entirely unconcerned by the arrival of strangers.

'You're late,' he said.

Rowan immediately pointed at Alias.

'His fault.'

'How is this my fault?'

'I don't know. It just feels right.'

The traveler laughed softly.

Something about the sound unsettled Alias. Not because it felt threatening. Because it felt familiar.

The stranger offered directions toward a place called the Valley of Echoes. According to him, travelers searching for answers often passed through it.

Before leaving, he studied Alias for a moment longer than necessary.

Then he said something that nobody understood.

'Be careful which version of yourself you choose to become.'

The traveler walked away before anyone could ask what he meant.

Eldric watched him disappear into the morning fog.

For the first time in days, the old mage looked genuinely troubled.

Chapter 36: The Valley of Echoes

The valley stretched between towering cliffs and remained hidden from the outside world until the travelers stood directly above it. Mist drifted across the ground in slow waves. Ancient ruins rested among the grass like fragments of forgotten dreams.

The place felt peaceful.

Too peaceful.

Every sound carried farther than it should have. Every word returned seconds later as a whisper from somewhere deeper within the valley.

At first the phenomenon seemed harmless.

Then the echoes began answering.

Questions asked aloud occasionally returned with different responses.

Comments were repeated using different wording.

Several times Rowan held entire conversations with an echo that insisted it was not an echo at all.

'I'm starting to dislike places that talk back,' he announced.

'You dislike most places,' Corvin replied.

'Yes, but now the feeling is mutual.'

Despite the humor, tension continued building beneath the surface. The valley seemed designed to force reflection. Every traveler confronted pieces of themselves they normally ignored.

Alias spent most of the evening alone beside a ruined wall overlooking the valley. The echoes carried voices through the mist. Some belonged to his companions.

Others did not.

Chapter 37: A Choice Made in Silence

Near the center of the valley stood a circle of ancient stones surrounding a black pool so still that it reflected the stars even during daylight.

The journals mentioned the place only briefly.

Varux had called it a crossroads without roads.

Nobody understood why until they arrived.

Standing beside the water felt strange. The surface reflected possibilities rather than appearances. Maris saw futures built around knowledge. Corvin saw journeys without end. Rowan claimed he saw himself becoming king of something, though nobody believed him.

Alias saw a road.

At the end of that road stood a figure.

Varux.

Not speaking.

Waiting.

The image lasted only a moment before fading.

When it vanished, Alias realized he already knew which direction he wanted to follow when they left the valley.

The problem was that he was no longer certain the others would follow.

That night the group sat around the campfire in uneasy silence. No arguments occurred. No decisions were made.

Yet everyone felt it. The road ahead was beginning to split. And sooner or later, they would have to choose which path to take.

Part VIII: The Fall Of Alias

Chapter 38: Leaving the Valley

Morning arrived beneath a blanket of pale mist, and for a long while none of them seemed eager to disturb it. The Valley of Echoes did not release its visitors all at once. It let them gather their packs, stamp out the ashes of their fire, and check the straps on their gear while the cliffs returned every small sound a moment late. Even ordinary things felt strangely preserved there. A buckle clicked twice.

Rowan cleared his throat and heard the sound answer him from somewhere among the rocks. Corvin folded the map with more care than usual. Maris stood at the edge of camp with her notebook closed against her chest, staring back toward the path that led to the black pool.

No one spoke about what they had seen in the water. That silence said more than questions would have. The pool had not shown them futures exactly, nor memories, nor warnings clear enough to obey. It had shown each of them something personal and then left them to carry it. Alias felt the weight of his own vision with every step as they climbed out of the valley. Varux waiting at the end of a road. Not calling, not threatening, not explaining.

Simply waiting with the patience of someone who already knew which direction Alias would choose.

The land changed as the valley fell behind them. Grass gave way to stone, and stone rose into broken ridges where old paths clung to the mountainsides. The air grew colder with each mile. By midday the mist had vanished, but the quiet remained. Rowan tried to break it several times with jokes about haunted valleys, dramatic pools, and roads that needed better signage, yet the humor never settled properly. It struck the group and slid away.

Eventually even Rowan stopped trying and walked with his hands tucked beneath his cloak, glancing ahead more than around.

Alias noticed the others noticing him. Maris watched him whenever she thought he was not looking. Corvin began asking more often whether they should stop, as if exhaustion might explain the distance growing in Alias's expression. Eldric said nothing, which somehow made him the worst of them. The old mage's silence had shape. It stood beside Alias like an unanswered question.

That evening, while camp settled among the stones, Alias opened Varux's journal again. He had read the same passages enough times that the words should have dulled. Instead they seemed to sharpen. The descriptions of roads, ruins, weather, and strange reflections carried a rhythm that felt increasingly familiar. Not identical to his own writing, but close enough that he understood choices Varux had made before fully reading the sentences.

Where Varux paused to sketch a bridge, Alias would have paused as well. Where Varux noted the angle of moonlight on a broken pillar, Alias found himself nodding before remembering he had never stood there.

Across the fire, Eldric finally spoke. 'You are looking for a difference.' Alias glanced up. The old mage sat with his cup held between both hands, the steam rising into the cold air. 'Between yourself and him.' Alias closed the journal slowly.

'Would that be strange?' Eldric considered the fire for a moment. 'No. It would be human.' Rowan, half-asleep nearby, muttered that Alias was technically wolffolk. Eldric did not look away from the flames.

'Human in the older sense,' he said. 'Afraid of becoming what he does not understand.' Alias had no answer to that, so he wrote the sentence down and disliked it for being useful.

Chapter 39: The Broken Journal

Three days later, the discovery happened because Rowan slipped. He insisted afterward that it had been a controlled descent. Corvin, who witnessed the entire event, called it falling with confidence. The truth lay somewhere between the two and involved loose gravel, an overgrown ridge, and Rowan vanishing halfway through a curtain of dry vines with a shout that startled birds from the rocks above.

When the others reached him, they found Rowan sitting amid the remains of a collapsed wall. Dust covered his coat. Leaves clung to his hair. He had a cut across one cheek and an expression that suggested he was deciding whether embarrassment could be turned into victory. Behind him, half-buried beneath stones dislodged by the fall, lay a weathered satchel. The leather had hardened with age, but the buckle still held.

Maris knelt before anyone else could touch it, her earlier alarm already giving way to scholarly focus.

The satchel contained pages rather than a book. Some had been folded carefully. Others were torn, damp at the edges, or marked with smears where rain had dragged ink into gray lines. Varux's handwriting appeared across most of them. Alias recognized it before Maris said anything. The sharp slant of certain letters, the small marks beside uncertain observations, the habit of adding weather notes even when danger clearly mattered more.

Seeing the scattered pages felt different from finding a journal. A journal suggested intention. Fragments suggested interruption.

They carried the pages to a sheltered place beneath an overhang and spent the afternoon piecing them together.

Maris worked with the patience of someone restoring a damaged map. Corvin weighed stones against the corners to keep the wind from stealing anything. Rowan sat unusually still, one hand pressed against the cut on his cheek. Alias watched the scattered entries slowly form a broken path through Varux's final weeks in the mountains.

At first the notes were familiar. Roads that did not appear on maps. Ruins with no names. A stream that ran uphill at dawn and downhill by evening. Then the tone changed. The handwriting tightened. Sentences became shorter. Observations gave way to warnings. One page contained only three lines written so firmly the pen had nearly torn through the paper: We were followed for two nights. The road behind us is not the road we walked yesterday. If this pattern repeats, the map is no longer trustworthy.

Alias read the lines three times before passing the page to Eldric. The old mage held it carefully, but his eyes did not move the way they usually did when reading. He was not studying the words. He was studying the ink, the pressure of the hand, the spaces between sentences. 'What?' Alias asked. Eldric took too long to answer. 'Fear changes handwriting,' he said at last. 'This is fear, but not panic.' 'Meaning?' Corvin asked.

Eldric folded the page with care. 'Meaning he still believed he could think his way through whatever was happening.' Rowan exhaled quietly. 'That sounds like someone we know.' No one laughed.

Chapter 40: Blood on the Stone

The broken pages led them toward an abandoned mountain pass that modern travelers avoided for reasons the maps described only as unreliable conditions. Corvin took offense to the phrase. Roads could be dangerous, unstable, flooded, blocked, or poorly maintained. Unreliable suggested personality, and Corvin disliked roads being given personalities. By the second day in the pass, however, even he stopped objecting.

The path shifted beneath them in small ways that were difficult to prove and impossible to ignore. A bend appeared sooner than expected. A stone marker stood on the wrong side of the trail. Footprints vanished from mud before rain could explain it.

Near dusk they found the campsite. At first it looked ordinary: a ring of stones, the remains of an old fire, a flattened patch of ground where someone had once slept. Rowan spotted the broken cup first. Maris found a torn strap caught beneath a rock. Corvin discovered a length of cord cut cleanly through. Alias found the blood.

It had darkened with time, but enough remained in the cracks between the stones to tell a story no one wanted to read. The stains marked the ground near the fire, then continued in a broken line toward a cluster of boulders at the edge of camp. There was no body. No grave. No weapon. Only marks left behind by violence and weather. The absence made the place feel worse.

Maris found more pages beneath one of the boulders. They had been pushed into a narrow gap and weighted with a flat stone, as though hidden quickly by someone who understood that paper might matter later. The top page had fused to the others at one edge. When Maris tried to separate them, the old blood pulled like sealing wax. She stopped and looked away for a moment before continuing with steadier hands.

They read by firelight after night fell. Nobody wanted to remain in the campsite, yet no one suggested leaving before they understood what they had found. The flames lit the pages from below, turning the damaged ink into shadows. We were followed. The road is no longer safe. Bizo thinks the ridge offers a way around them, but I am not certain there is still an around.

The next line had been partly lost to a stain. What remained read: If anyone finds this, tell them the map was not wrong.
We were.

The name Bizo settled into the circle like another person taking a seat by the fire. Rowan looked up first. 'Friend?' Maris checked the earlier pages. 'Travel companion, I think. The name appears twice before this, but only in passing.' Corvin stared toward the dark edge of camp. 'If there were two of them, where is the second?' Nobody answered.

Alias kept his eyes on the page because looking at the blood-dark stones around them made the question feel too large.

Chapter 41: The Last Entry

Rain reached them the next afternoon and turned the pass into a narrow river of mud. Progress became impossible before sunset. They found shelter inside the remains of an old watchtower built into the mountainside, its lower chamber half-collapsed but dry enough to keep a fire alive. Wind pressed through cracks in the stone. Water drummed against the broken roof above.

The storm reminded Alias of Maanhaven, though there was no warmth here, no Gerhardt behind a counter, no tavern windows glowing against the dark. Only stone, rain, and pages that felt heavier with each discovery.

Rowan found the final sheet while trying to secure a blanket against the wall. A loose board shifted beneath his hand, revealing a narrow space behind it. The page had been folded twice and wrapped in oiled cloth. Whoever hid it had taken more care with this one. That frightened Alias before he even saw the writing.

Maris unfolded it near the fire. The chamber seemed to quiet around her. Even the rain felt distant. The handwriting was Varux's, but changed. Not messy, not panicked, only tired in a way that seemed to reach through the ink. The first lines described the storm outside, the condition of the pass, and the likelihood that pursuit had resumed. Then the entry turned personal.

Bizo says I should stop writing and save my strength. He is probably right, which is inconvenient, because I have always disliked other people being right when I am injured. If this page survives, then perhaps something of the road survives with it. If it reaches those who knew Alias, tell them he tried to remember properly.

Tell them he spoke of a tavern in Maanhaven, a foxfolk who pretended not to care, a scholar who loved questions too much to fear them, a surveyor who trusted maps more than people until people proved useful, a fool with a good heart who laughed too loudly, and an old mage who saw more than was fair.

Maris stopped reading. Her face had gone pale. Rowan's hands tightened around his knees. Corvin looked at Alias and then quickly away, as though the glance itself had become painful. Alias could not move. He could barely breathe. The descriptions were too specific. Too intimate. Too full of things Varux should only know if Alias had told him everything, and Alias had no memory of doing so.

Maris forced herself to continue. The final lines were worse. Tell them I regret not seeing them one last time. Tell them I remembered less than I wanted and more than I deserved. Tell them the road was beautiful, even at the end. The last sentence began with I do not think I will and disappeared beneath a dark stain that covered the lower half of the page.

No one spoke for a long time. The rain filled the silence. Rowan stood suddenly and walked to the far side of the chamber, one hand pressed over his mouth. Corvin began folding and unfolding a strap on his pack with mechanical precision. Maris held the page as though it might crumble if grief became too loud. Eldric remained very still, staring not at the blood, but at the words above it.

Alias looked at the stain until it stopped being ink, stopped being evidence, and became an ending.

Chapter 42: Ashes of a Name

The funeral happened without a body because there was nothing else to bury. Morning broke gray and cold over the mountains, the storm reduced to a thin rain that clung to cloaks and hair. They climbed a hill overlooking the pass and built a fire from damp wood that smoked more than it burned. Nobody suggested a ceremony. Nobody asked whether one was necessary. The act formed around them quietly, the way grief sometimes does when language arrives too late.

They did not burn the original pages. Maris would not allow it, and no one argued. Instead she copied the final lines by hand onto fresh paper, her writing careful and uneven. Corvin found a flat stone and placed it beside the fire. Rowan gathered small pieces of mountain pine, muttering complaints about wet branches because anger was easier to carry than sorrow.

Eldric stood apart for a while with his hood drawn low, watching the pass below as if expecting someone to emerge from it after all.

Maris spoke first when the fire finally caught. She spoke of records, of memory, of the cruelty of knowing a person through what they left behind rather than what they had time to say. Corvin followed with fewer words. He said Varux had been methodical, observant, and irritatingly correct about several road conditions. Coming from Corvin, it sounded like admiration.

Rowan tried to speak next and failed twice before managing to say that he had wanted to meet the man properly, and that it was unfair to miss someone who had never sat beside your fire.

Alias could not speak. The others did not ask him to. He stood with the coin in his hand, thumb pressed against the worn symbol, and listened as the copied page curled in the flames.

Smoke climbed into the gray morning. For a moment the firelight made the coin warm. Not with magic, he thought. With his own hand. With the desperate pressure of holding too tightly to something that had never explained itself.

Eldric spoke last. He did not offer certainty. That would have been dishonest. He said only that roads sometimes carried names farther than bodies could go, and that a life did not become smaller because its ending was hidden. Then he placed a small piece of folded paper into the fire. Alias did not see what was written on it. He suspected Eldric intended it that way.

When the flames died, they left the stone beside the ashes. No name was carved into it. There had been too many names already. Varux. Bizo. Alias, though no one said that one aloud. The mountain wind moved through the pass, carrying smoke eastward until it vanished among the ridges.

That night, far beyond the pass, another fire burned in a hollow between stones. A traveler sat beside it with a cloak drawn low and a journal open across his knees. His hair was longer than it had been once, rough from weather and neglect. His ears and tail were hidden beneath careful layers of spellwork and cloth, and the face he wore would not have been recognized by anyone who had known him in Maanhaven.

He dipped his pen, hesitated, and smiled sadly at the blank page. Bizo, he wrote at last, then stopped to consider the shape of the lie. It would do for now.

Part IX: The Messenger

Chapter 43: Beyond the Mountains

The mountains did not release them easily. Days passed beneath gray skies and cold winds that swept through the passes like restless spirits. The roads twisted between cliffs and deep valleys, forcing the travelers to move slowly. Villages appeared only occasionally, scattered among the hills like forgotten islands surrounded by stone.

Yet no matter where they stopped, the same name eventually surfaced.

Varux.

Sometimes it emerged during conversations between merchants gathered around evening fires. Sometimes it appeared in journals resting upon dusty shelves. Once it had been carved into the frame of an ancient bridge older than the settlement surrounding it. Every clue suggested the same thing. Varux had passed through these lands.

According to everything they had discovered, that should have been impossible. The journals described a man whose trail ended in blood and silence. The roads described a man who had continued onward regardless. Alias found himself thinking about that contradiction more often than he cared to admit.

Chapter 44: The Inn at Gray Hollow

Gray Hollow appeared near sunset. Lanterns glowed beside doorways, music drifted through open windows, and the scent of fresh bread carried through the streets. After weeks of mountains and lonely roads, the village felt almost welcoming.

The common room of the inn was crowded enough that finding a table required patience. Travelers exchanged stories while merchants argued over routes and prices. Somewhere near the fireplace a musician attempted to play a familiar song and failed repeatedly, though that did little to discourage him.

The name appeared during dinner.

Not Varux.

Bizo.

The innkeeper mentioned it casually while placing a tray of food upon the table.

'If you're looking for information about the eastern roads, talk to Bizo. Strange fellow, but he knows more about this region than anyone else.'

The group exchanged glances.

'And how does he know all that?' Rowan asked.

The innkeeper shrugged.

'Says he traveled with a man named Varux once.'

Nobody slept particularly well that night.

Chapter 45: The Man Called Bizo

They found him the following afternoon sitting beneath a tree overlooking the river.

At first glance he seemed entirely ordinary. His clothes showed signs of heavy travel. Dark hair reached almost to his shoulders. A weathered notebook rested beside him in the grass. A deep hood shadowed much of his face despite the clear afternoon, and for a brief moment Alias found himself wondering why. Nothing about him suggested mystery.

Then he smiled.

At first glance he seemed entirely ordinary. His clothes showed signs of heavy travel. Dark hair reached almost to his shoulders. A weathered notebook rested beside him in the grass. Nothing about him suggested mystery.

Then he smiled.

'You took longer than expected,' he said.

Rowan immediately pointed toward Alias.

'His fault.'

'Why does everyone keep blaming me?'

'Because statistically it keeps working.'

To everyone's surprise, Bizo laughed. Not loudly. Not dramatically. Just enough to suggest he understood the joke before it had fully been explained.

The movement shifted the hood slightly. For the briefest instant Alias thought he saw something beneath the dark hair, but the moment vanished before he could be certain.

Strange, he thought, though he could not explain why.

The conversation that followed only deepened the mystery.

Bizo knew details about places the group had visited. He knew stories connected to the Structures. More importantly, he knew things about Varux. A great many things.

When Maris finally asked how well he had known the traveler, Bizo's expression softened.

'Long enough to call him a friend,' he said quietly.

For reasons Alias could not explain, the answer felt strangely sad.

Chapter 46: Stories of Varux

The group remained in Gray Hollow for several days. Most evenings ended the same way: a table near the fire, a growing collection of notebooks, and Bizo telling stories.

Through those stories Varux slowly transformed from a mystery into a person.

He worried too much. He wrote constantly. He asked questions nobody else considered important. He became distracted whenever a new puzzle appeared. More than once Rowan interrupted a story and frowned.

'That sounds familiar.'

Bizo merely smiled and continued.

The similarities became increasingly difficult to ignore. Even Corvin noticed them. Maris filled pages of notes. Eldric remained unusually quiet throughout every conversation, watching rather than speaking.

Only once did he ask a direct question.

'How long ago did you last see him?'

For the briefest moment something unreadable crossed Bizo's face.

'Not as long ago as I would like,' he answered.

Eldric never pressed further. Yet Alias noticed that the old mage continued watching Bizo long after everyone else had looked away.

Chapter 47: The Beginning of Doubt

The realization did not arrive all at once.

It began with small things. A phrase. A habit. The way Bizo held a notebook while thinking. The way he paused before answering difficult questions. The way he occasionally looked toward the eastern horizon as though expecting someone to appear.

One evening Rowan finally voiced what several others had already begun suspecting.

'You know,' he said carefully, 'for someone who traveled with Varux, you sound a lot like him.'

Silence settled around the campfire.

Bizo stared into the flames for several seconds before smiling.

Not happily.

Not sadly.

Just knowingly.

'I've heard that before,' he said.

The answer should have ended the conversation. Instead it created even more questions. Across the fire, Eldric lowered his gaze to the notebook resting on his lap. For the first time since meeting Bizo, he looked less confused and more concerned, as though a puzzle he had been struggling to solve was finally beginning to reveal its shape.

And somewhere beyond Gray Hollow, beyond the forests and hills stretching toward the east, another road waited. A road leading toward truths none of them were prepared to face.

Part X: The Flip Side Of Knowledge

Chapter 48: The Road East

The road beyond Gray Hollow did not look important at first. It slipped away from the village between low stone walls and fields pale with morning frost, then climbed slowly toward the eastern hills as though it had no interest in drama. Yet every person walking it felt the change. Gray Hollow had given them Bizo. Bizo had given them stories of Varux.

And somewhere ahead, according to every journal, every map, and every uneasy instinct among them, waited the place where those stories finally ended.

Bizo walked near the front with Rowan, answering questions with the patience of someone who had expected them. That was what bothered Alias most. Not the answers themselves, but the ease with which they came. Bizo knew which roads had poor bridges before Corvin found them on the map. He knew which villages would charge too much for bread. He knew that Rowan would ask about hidden doors in any ruin larger than a shed.

He even knew, somehow, that Maris preferred to copy inscriptions before eating, because otherwise she would forget the food existed. None of those details proved anything. Together, they made the air around him feel crowded with old familiarity.

During the first week of travel, the group tried to behave normally and failed in different ways. Rowan became louder, which meant he was nervous. Corvin became quieter, which meant the same thing. Maris filled pages with comparisons between Bizo's stories and Varux's journals, underlining matching phrases until the paper began to look wounded. Eldric said almost nothing, though his eyes rarely left Bizo for long. Alias noticed that most of all. The old mage did not watch people without reason.

Once, while Bizo adjusted the hood of his travel cloak against the wind, Alias thought he caught a glimpse of something beneath the dark hair. Not a face. Not clearly. Just the brief outline of something that vanished almost immediately. When he looked again, there was nothing unusual to see. For reasons he could not explain, the moment stayed with him.

They camped on the seventh night beneath a row of bent trees overlooking the sea road. The eastern ocean could not yet be seen, but the wind carried salt across the hills. Bizo sat beside the fire with his notebook closed upon his knee, listening while Rowan described a bridge collapse from three years earlier in such exaggerated detail that Corvin interrupted four times to correct the structure of the story as well as the structure of the bridge.

Bizo laughed at the right moments. Too right, Alias thought. As though he had heard the story before, or had known exactly where it was going.

When the laughter faded, Maris asked him about Varux again. She did it gently, but everyone heard the sharpness beneath the question. Bizo looked into the fire for a long moment before answering. He said Varux had been stubborn, too curious for his own safety, unable to leave a mystery alone even when warned. Rowan muttered that this sounded painfully familiar. Bizo only smiled. Alias did not.

Something in his chest tightened, though he could not decide whether the feeling was fear, recognition, or both.

Chapter 49: What the Mage Saw

Eldric waited until the others slept before speaking. The fire had burned low, leaving the campsite washed in red-gold light and long shadows. Bizo remained awake across from him, notebook still unopened, hands folded loosely in his lap. He did not look surprised when the old mage finally lifted his gaze. If anything, he looked tired. That, more than anything else, confirmed what Eldric had begun to suspect.

'You are hiding behind more than a name,' Eldric said. His voice was quiet enough that the sleepers would not stir, yet firm enough that the words could not be mistaken for conversation. Bizo did not answer immediately. Wind moved through the bent trees behind them, carrying the distant scent of salt and rain. For several breaths, he only watched the embers settle.

Then he smiled, but it was not the easy smile he had used at the inn, nor the teasing one he offered Rowan. It was older than both. It belonged to someone who had been waiting for a door to open and dreading the moment it finally did.

'I wondered when you would say it,' Bizo replied. Eldric leaned forward slightly, studying him with the same patience he had once used when explaining difficult magic to Alias by pretending not to teach at all. 'The illusion is good,' he said. 'Better than most. Not merely face and voice. Posture. Weight. Presence. Whoever shaped it understood that a disguise is more than appearance.' Bizo's expression shifted then, the smallest fracture in the mask. 'You can see that much?' 'No,' Eldric said. 'I can feel what it costs you to maintain.'

For the first time since Gray Hollow, Bizo looked genuinely unsettled. He glanced toward the sleeping group, then back to Eldric. 'If you know, why not wake them?' Eldric's answer came after a pause. 'Because I do not know enough. And because some truths, once spoken too early, break more than they reveal.' The old mage looked toward Alias's sleeping form across the campfire. 'But I know this. Whatever you are, whatever name you wear, you are not merely the man you claim to be.'

Bizo lowered his head. The firelight caught strands of dark hair along his face, and for a moment the illusion seemed to blur at the edges. Not vanish. Not fail. Simply tremble, like a reflection disturbed by a stone thrown into water. Eldric saw enough to understand he had not imagined the pattern. He also saw enough to understand that forcing the truth from him would be cruel. So he said nothing more.

He only sat beside the dying fire until dawn, while Bizo watched the eastern road as though every mile ahead carried a debt he had not yet paid.

Chapter 50: The Final Structure

The final Structure stood beside the eastern sea. They reached it at sunset, after a long descent through hills of pale grass and wind-carved stone. Unlike the City of Glass, it did not glitter. Unlike the Anchor, it did not dominate the sky. It waited quietly on a cliff above the water, a ring of white pillars surrounding a low circular chamber.

Waves struck the rocks far below, sending spray into the air where it caught the last light of day and vanished like scattered glass.

No one spoke as they approached. Even Rowan seemed to understand that jokes would not survive in that place. The symbols carved upon the pillars were the same ones they had followed since Maanhaven: on the wagon, on the coin, in the journals, in ruins, towers, bridges, and places that seemed to remember them before they arrived. Maris touched one of the markings with trembling fingers. Corvin stood beside her with a map hanging uselessly at his side. Eldric watched Bizo. Alias watched the doorway.

Inside, the chamber was smaller than expected. Its walls were smooth pale stone, polished until they reflected shapes without becoming mirrors. There were no shelves, no instruments, no great mechanism buried beneath the floor. At the center stood a single pedestal. Upon it rested a notebook. For a moment Alias thought it belonged to Bizo. Then he saw the worn corner of the cover, the stitched repair along the spine, the faint ink stain near the lower edge, and the breath left his body.

It was his notebook. Not similar. Not another traveler's version of it. His. The same battered cover he had carried out of Maanhaven. The same repairs. The same stubbornness holding it together. Yet when he opened it, the pages were filled with years he had not lived. Roads he had not walked. Structures he had not seen. Notes written in his hand, older and steadier, but unmistakably his.

He turned page after page while the others gathered close behind him, and with each entry the chamber seemed to grow quieter.

The final page contained only one sentence, written carefully across the center as though the writer had known it would be the last thing read before the truth arrived. You already know the answer. You are simply afraid to say it. Alias stared at the words until they blurred. Somewhere behind him, Bizo drew a slow breath. The sound was small, but in that chamber it was enough. Everyone heard it. Everyone turned.

Chapter 51: Varux

For a long time nobody moved. The sea beat against the cliffs outside, steady and distant, while inside the chamber every eye fixed on Bizo. He stood near the entrance, hands at his sides, face pale beneath the illusion he had carried for so long. The easy traveler from Gray Hollow was gone. The messenger was gone with him. What remained was someone cornered by truth and too tired to keep running from it.

Eldric spoke first. 'Enough,' he said, not harshly, but with the authority of someone closing a door that had been left open too long. Rowan looked from him to Bizo and back again, confusion sharpening into alarm. Maris clutched her notebook against her chest. Corvin's hand tightened around the edge of the pedestal. Alias did not speak at all. The sentence on the page still burned behind his eyes.

Bizo gave a small, broken laugh. 'I wanted more time,' he said. 'That was always the mistake, wasn't it? Thinking one more road, one more night, one more answer would make it easier.' His voice changed slightly as he spoke. Not dramatically. Not suddenly. It softened at the edges, deepened in places, becoming something closer to the voice beneath the voice. The illusion around him trembled again, and this time everyone saw it. Rowan took half a step back. Maris whispered his name, though she did not know which name she meant.

The spell fell away like mist burned off by morning sun. Darker travel clothes remained. Longer hair, rougher than the careful shape Bizo had worn, slipped loose around his face. The lines of his features shifted, not into something entirely unfamiliar, but into someone the journals had taught them to imagine. Older than Bizo. Wearier. Marked by roads.

The man standing before them was no longer the messenger who had claimed to know Varux. He was the answer to that claim.

'My name was never Bizo,' he said. The words trembled, but only slightly. 'Bizo was a door. A way to stand near you without forcing the truth before you were ready.' He looked at Maris, then Corvin, then Rowan, and finally Eldric. 'My name is Varux Hyborea.'

The name did not explode through the room. It settled. That made it worse. For months Varux had been a journal, a rumor, a ghost walking ahead of them. He had been the man whose blood stained pages they carried. He had been the friend they mourned without meeting. Now he stood ten paces away, alive, and the grief they had built around him had nowhere to go.

Rowan was the first to find words. 'No,' he said, because it was the only word available. Varux accepted it with a small nod. Maris looked as though every note she had written had betrayed her at once. Corvin stared at the man with the furious concentration of someone trying to force the world back into a shape that made sense. Eldric only closed his eyes for a moment, and when he opened them again there was sorrow there, but not surprise. He had known enough. Not all of it, but enough to dread what came next.

Alias looked at Varux and felt no triumph at solving the mystery. He felt as though the floor beneath his life had become glass, and beneath it waited another life, older and darker, staring back. The final sentence in the notebook whispered through his thoughts. You already know the answer. You are simply afraid to say it.

Chapter 52: Alias

Varux stepped toward the pedestal, slow enough that no one mistook the movement for escape. He reached for the notebook but stopped before touching it, as though even now he needed permission. Alias did not give it. He could not. His hands rested on either side of the open pages, and for a moment he hated them. Hated the handwriting. Hated the familiar loops of ink. Hated the way the truth had waited patiently for him to arrive.

'There is one more thing,' Varux said. Rowan made a sound somewhere between a laugh and a protest. 'No. Absolutely not. You do not get another thing. You were Bizo, then you were Varux, and that is already too many things.' Under any other sky, under any other weight, someone might have laughed. No one did. Varux lowered his gaze. 'I know.' 'Stop saying that,' Rowan snapped. 'Stop saying you know. If you knew, you would have told us before we mourned you.'

The words struck harder than any weapon could have. Varux flinched. Not from fear. From recognition. Maris drew a shaking breath, and when she spoke her voice was small. 'We mourned you, and we never even knew what we were mourning.' She looked toward Alias then, and something in her expression changed. Not fully. Not yet.

But the first terrible line connected in her mind between the notebook, the memories, the handwriting, and the man standing before them. 'Alias,' she whispered.

Alias looked up. The sound of his name in that moment felt like a hand reaching through water. Varux's expression broke. Not completely, but enough. Enough for Rowan to see it. Enough for Corvin to stop arguing with reality. Enough for Eldric's face to soften with the pain of being right. The chamber held them all in a silence so complete that even the sea outside seemed to pause.

Varux finally touched the notebook and turned several pages. There were entries about Maanhaven written from memory: the creak of The Wandering Lantern's sign, Gerhardt's habit of polishing mugs when worried, the exact shape of rain on the window beside Alias's favorite table.

There were sketches of the wagon's interior before Maris had catalogued it, notes about Corvin's first bridge argument, a private joke Rowan had made on the second day of travel and forgotten by the third. There were things no stranger could know. Things no friend could have been told in such detail. Things only Alias could carry forward because Alias had lived them.

Corvin sat down heavily on the nearest stone bench. 'No,' he said, though the word had lost its strength. He pressed both hands over his mouth, staring at the floor. 'No, because that would mean...' He did not finish. He did not need to. Maris was crying now, quietly at first, then less quietly when the truth finally stopped pretending to be impossible. Rowan stared at Varux as if seeing him for the first time and the last time together.

'I am not only Varux,' the older traveler said. His voice was almost gone. 'Varux is the name I took because I thought Alias had failed. Because I thought becoming someone else would hurt less than remembering the person who left you behind.'

He looked at them then, and the last of the mask fell away, not from magic but from shame. 'But I was wrong. I was Alias first. I am still Alias, even if it took me years to understand that.'

The glamour faded completely. Long-hidden wolf ears emerged from beneath the dark hair, followed moments later by the tail he had spent years concealing from the world. The last traces of Bizo disappeared with the illusion, leaving nothing behind except the truth he had carried for far too long.

The words changed the room. Not quickly. Not cleanly. Grief rarely obeys revelation. For several seconds nobody moved. Then Maris crossed the distance between them and struck him once in the chest with the side of her fist. It was not a hard blow, but it startled him more than any shout could have. 'We thought you were dead,' she said, tears bright on her face. Alias opened his mouth, but she struck him again, weaker this time. 'We buried you.'

'I know,' he said, and this time the words were not an excuse. They were a confession. Maris shook her head, furious and relieved and heartbroken all at once. Then she hugged him so suddenly that he nearly stumbled. For a moment he stood frozen, arms hovering uselessly, as though he had forgotten how comfort worked. Then he held her back. His eyes closed. Something in him gave way.

Rowan lasted three breaths longer. He crossed the room with a look so dangerous that Corvin half rose to stop him. Rowan grabbed Alias by the shoulders and shoved him back just enough to look at him properly. 'You absolute idiot,' he said. His voice cracked on the last word. 'Do you have any idea what you did to us?' Alias nodded once. Rowan's grip tightened. 'No. You do not get to nod like that.

You do not get to be tragic and mysterious and older and sad and think that counts as an apology.'

A laugh escaped Alias then, small and broken and entirely wrong for the moment. Rowan froze. Maris looked up from where she still clung to him. Corvin stared. The laugh faded almost immediately, but it left something behind. Rowan's expression changed first. The anger did not vanish, but it cracked open, and relief came pouring through. 'There,' he whispered. Alias blinked. 'There what?'

Rowan shook his head, eyes wet despite his obvious attempt to prevent it. 'That laugh. I knew that laugh.'

He pulled Alias into a hug so rough it was nearly an attack. 'I'm not calling you Varux,' Rowan muttered against his shoulder. Alias tried to answer and failed. 'Why not?' he managed at last. Rowan pulled back just enough to glare at him. 'Because you're Alias, idiot.' The words broke what remained of the room. Maris laughed through tears.

Corvin covered his face with both hands and made a sound that was not quite laughter, not quite grief, but somehow both. Even Eldric smiled, though his eyes shone in the pale light of the chamber.

Corvin came last. Of course he did. He stood only after several long moments, straightened his coat as though dignity could be repaired by habit, and approached with the stern expression of a man preparing to deliver a lecture. Instead he stopped in front of Alias and did nothing. The silence stretched.

Then Corvin exhaled, shook his head, and embraced him with such awkward sincerity that Rowan immediately began crying harder while pretending he was not. 'Your explanation,' Corvin said into Alias's shoulder, 'had better be extremely thorough.' Alias nodded. 'It will be.' 'With diagrams.' 'If necessary.' 'It will be necessary.'

Eldric did not hug him immediately. The old mage stood apart, watching the reunion with an expression so gentle it almost hurt to see. When Alias finally looked at him, Eldric stepped forward and placed one hand on his shoulder. 'I suspected,' he said. 'Not enough to know. Enough to hope.' Alias swallowed. 'You could have forced the truth.' 'Yes.'

Eldric smiled faintly.

'And I have spent a long life learning that forcing truth is not the same as receiving it.' Then, at last, he pulled him close. Alias held onto him as though the years between them might finally stop moving.

They remained in the chamber long after the Structure had given them its answer. No one demanded the full story at once. Not truly. Rowan demanded several pieces of it, loudly and out of order. Maris demanded to know which journals were lies and which were warnings. Corvin wanted a timeline. Eldric wanted tea, though he admitted the location made that unlikely. Alias answered what he could. For everything else, he promised time.

For once, nobody rejected that. Time was exactly what they had thought they had lost. Having any of it back felt impossible enough.

Chapter 53: The Name Not Written

Dawn found them outside the final Structure, standing on the cliffs above the eastern sea. The sky had cleared during the night. Sunlight stretched across the water in long silver paths, and gulls circled far below as though the world had returned to ordinary things without asking permission. Behind them, the pale stone chamber stood quiet. It no longer seemed like an ending. It seemed like a place where one had been survived.

Alias stood a little apart from the others at first. Old habits did not vanish simply because a truth had been spoken. The road north curved along the cliffs toward distant hills. The road south descended toward ports and towns and maps not yet drawn. Neither road glowed. Neither carried symbols. Neither promised answers. That was what made the choice feel real.

After so many Structures, so many signs, so many impossible clues, the next decision belonged to him.

The others waited. Maris sat on a low wall with her notebook open but did not write. Corvin had unfolded a map and was pretending not to glance over every few seconds. Rowan paced because stillness had always been his least natural state. Eldric watched the sea. Nobody rushed Alias. Nobody demanded that he explain who he was now, or who he intended to become. That kindness nearly undid him more than the anger had.

One road was familiar in a way that frightened him. It was the road he had walked before, or would walk before, depending on which part of his life one chose to believe first. Alone, he had become Varux. Alone, he had learned enough to survive, enough to hide, enough to turn grief into a name and wear it like armor. Alone was simple. Alone was safe in the selfish way loneliness sometimes pretended to be safety. He understood that road. That was why it tempted him.

The other road held no certainty at all. Together meant questions spoken aloud. It meant explanations. Arguments. Forgiveness that would not arrive in one grand moment but in hundreds of smaller ones. It meant Rowan bringing up the fake death whenever he felt dramatic, which would be often.

It meant Maris asking for every detail, Corvin building charts to prove the timeline was offensive, and Eldric pretending not to enjoy watching all of them rebuild what had been broken. Together meant being seen. That frightened him too.

Rowan eventually ran out of patience, though to his credit he lasted longer than anyone expected. 'Well?' he asked. Alias turned. 'Well what?' Rowan spread his arms toward the roads. 'Are you coming with us or planning another five-year dramatic disappearance? Because if it is the second one, I would like advance notice so I can prepare an appropriately angry speech.' Maris looked up from her notebook. 'He has several prepared already.'

'I have categories,' Rowan said. 'Different lengths. Different emotional tones.' Corvin sighed. 'Of course you do.'

Alias laughed. This time nobody froze when they heard it. That alone felt like healing. He walked back toward them slowly, stopping where both roads could still be seen behind him. 'If we are doing this,' Maris said, closing her notebook, 'we need records. Proper records. No fake deaths, no misleading names, no blood-stained theatrical nonsense.' Rowan pointed at Alias. 'Especially that last one.' Alias raised both hands. 'Understood.'

Corvin unfolded the map fully. 'If we are continuing, we also need a structure of command.' Rowan groaned. 'Absolutely not.' 'We nearly died several times because nobody respected planning.' 'We survived because I added energy.' 'That is not a category of strategy.'

The argument grew from there with almost comforting speed. Eldric listened for a while, then observed that if they meant to keep traveling together, they would need something else as well. A name. Not for history, not for glory, not for the benefit of anyone who might one day turn their mistakes into songs, but for themselves. Something to place at the top of the next page. Something that meant they were no longer merely following the road. They were choosing it.

Suggestions came immediately. Most were terrible. Rowan offered three involving bravery, two involving dogs, and one involving a goose that everyone rejected before he explained it. Corvin suggested something practical and was ignored with deep respect. Maris produced a phrase so elegant that nobody could remember the beginning by the time she reached the end.

Eldric offered one that sounded wise until Rowan asked what it meant and Eldric admitted meaning was optional. Alias listened, smiling despite himself, as the sun climbed higher over the sea.

Eventually, after far too much debate, they settled on one. The book does not record it. Not here. Not yet. Perhaps some names are stronger when allowed to wait. Perhaps the road should keep at least one secret for the stories still to come.

What matters is that when the name was finally spoken, everyone grew quiet for a moment, and in that quiet Alias felt the shape of something new settle among them. Not perfect.

Not fixed. Not healed all at once. But real.

He looked once more toward the road he might have walked alone. Then he looked at the people waiting for him:
impatient, wounded, stubborn, impossible, and somehow still there. They had waited through grief. They had waited through lies. They had waited through names that were not names and deaths that were not deaths. Now they waited for an answer.

Alias smiled. Then he gave it.

Together, they started walking. Behind them, the eastern sea carried away the last traces of an old ending. Ahead waited new roads, new questions, and the first unwritten page of whatever came next.

QR CODE WEBPAGE:

<https://creatorpromote.com/portalmasterofgames/fools-stage/>

The road does not have to end here.

Scan the code to read Fool's Stage online for free, continue the story, explore future books and extra pages, or share the road with someone else.

You can also find more from the creator behind the story.